"This connects with the main shaft. It is full of smoke and gas. See that?" pointing to a thin stream of blue smoke that rose from the opening. "You couldn't go down twenty feet and live."

But old Ne never hesitated. Seizing a candle from a miner's lamp he lighted it and started laboriously to climb down the narrow, well-like shaft, and was soon lost to sight at a turn.

The crowd waited breathlessly—five—ten—fifteen minutes that seemed hours.

"It is no use," said the man who had led the way; "but I am going to try to get him; bring me a rope." When a rope was found and tied to his waist, he started down, saying, "If I jerk the rope or quit going haul me back."

He made the turn, but a few moments later the rope stopped and the crowd, obeying his instructions, hauled in the rope, dragging to the open air his unconscious form.

Three days later, after the fire had burned itself out, the bodies of t tombed men were found. All had d suffocation, untouched by the fire, had been confined to the timbere tion of the mine. Old Ne had gone part way and had fallen with his h stretched forward.

Chansung arrived at the min evening of the same day the bodies recovered. A few words told him

Nyangsie faltered. "He did not lieve in Jesus, Chansung, and I wo follow him."

Chansung rose and secured a sm well worn book from his pack.

"Yes, mother, I know that fat did not know clearly who Jesus was; listen to these words of Jesus hims 'greater love hath no man than th that a man lay down his life for friends. Ye are my friends if ye do things which I command you.' Moth I believe that father unknowingly w a friend of Jesus. Follow Jesus with m and I believe we will follow him."

Old Nyangsie looked up with grate love shining through her tears.

"My son, I will go."

E CANNOT hope to stand higher in the world than we do in the home. Home is our train- und, our preparatory school. If there, we make success difficult here. The true home is a little acy in which each, through love, o serve all the others rather than . Parents must neither seek to solute nor avoid necessary re- s. Let us remember that he is greatest who is servant of all and that true service in Christ's name is the accepted crown of our life of faith.

Followers of a Joyful Christ

Epworth League Topic. John 15:11; Luke 15:6-10.

THE Christian who is not happy has lost the key of the Christian life. He is out of tune, an unharmonious discord in the song of salvation. You can tell a Christian in heathen lands by the radiant light of inward joy which distinguishes his face from the stolid heathen countenances about him. You can discern the successful Christian life here at home by the look of contented, happy peace which makes even homely features radiant with light. Christ brings us his joy, the joy of release from sin, of assurance of salvation, of opportunity for service. Praise, rejoicing, exultation, are but sound expressions of our conquering faith. We do not sufficiently recognize the religious value of joy. We should plan more praise services, sing more hallelujahs. And we should plan for joyful social occasions. Clean fun is a close cousin of religious joy; each makes the other more complete. Long-faced examples of painful piety never did represent a true Christianity.

The Packers and High Prices

UR editorial, "High Prices Must Come Down," in the issue of June ves the impression that price fluctu- s are wholly within the control of eller, and can be manipulated at While meat prices are not men- d specifically in this article, Swift mpany is anxious to do what it can lp the consuming public under- the economic reasons for price ations.

e packing industry is peculiar in it has no control over the supply raw materials. Manufacturers in al purchase their raw materials the market is favorable and sell similar conditions. But the rs have no means of regulating tock receipts and cannot purchase tock for future slaughter. In gen- the packers aim to clean up each receipts and not hold over any derable portion to the next day. arly the packers must move the ting dressed meats on to the market arly day by day, and cannot with- these products from the market conditions are favorable. Meat, ther perishable commodities, must oved before it spoils, even though may mean a loss. Contrary to lar belief, fresh beef cannot be held ld storage more than a very few . It can be held longer if frozen, there is little domestic demand for n beef, and that only at lower s than fresh.

view of these conditions, and con- ing the varying consumer demand neat as influenced by weather, sea- l conditions, etc., it is apparent that ackers cannot control prices in any , even if they had any inclination rd manipulation. The present dressed-beef market conditions, as outlined in the enclosed "Review of Live Cattle and Dressed Beef Situation Since January 1, 1919," show how powerless the packers are to keep up prices and prevent losses in the face of fundamental economic conditions. It would indeed be a poor monopoly or "profiteer" that could not prevent continued losses over a five-month period!

An era of high prices usually results in accusations of "profiteering" and manipulation. Yet if each critic could and would take the time to determine the real causes back of the shift in prices on any particular commodity, he would find that these changes were due to fundamental conditions of supply and demand. This does not mean that in particular localized cases profiteering has not been possible, and perhaps, at times, practiced successfully. But sound economic thinking can lead to only one conclusion—that the steadily increasing price level in the last few years in all countries in the world, including even those countries practically unaffected by war demands, must be due to more fundamental factors than artificial price manipulation. The economic and business journals are filled with discussions of this important question, and the truth is easily available to any one who sincerely desires to learn the facts.

That is the motive behind Swift & Company advertising—to give the general public the real facts regarding our business, and to clear up some of these popular economic fallacies.

A Real Help at Preserving Time

WHEN canning and preserving time comes and jars are brought out, the first need of all is a pure cleansing agent which will thoroughly cleanse and thoroughly rinse out, leaving your jars and glasses sparkling-fresh and sweet. Use a tablespoonful of Gold Dust to a dishpan of hot water. See how thoroughly and quickly it cleanses—how completely it rinses out. Immerse the jars and glasses, churn the soft Gold Dust water about in them for a few seconds, rinse with clear hot water. Out they come crystal-clear and sweet—ready for your fruits and vegetables.

When a Bacteriologist washes dishes!

THE U. S. Government, in a Farmers' Bulletin, tells us that Bacteriologists are very particular about the way dishes and dish towels are washed. Now, you may not be worrying about bacteria. But you will be glad to know that Gold Dust, which contains the best of cleansing ingredients "combined in just the right proportion," leaves your dishes "sterile." Hot water must be used and the dishes wiped with a cloth which has itself been washed with Gold Dust. Gold Dust dissolves every particle of grease. Thus nothing can "stick" to the clean sparkling surface.

The State Food Controller of France, on July 7, was quoted as declaring that only a national food monopoly could restrain middlemen and profiteers.

CENTRAL AMERICA'S LEAGUE OF NATIONS. The Salvadorian Government on July 7 proposed to the governments of Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua mutual action to establish peace in Costa Rica.

GERMANY RATIFIES PEACE. The German National Assembly, on July 9, by a vote of 208 to 215 ratified the peace treaty signed at Versailles on June 28, as well as the supplementary agreements, the Polish treaty and the agreement for the occupation of the Rhineland. In urging the ratification Dr. Herman Muller, Foreign Minister, said: "We are about to enter upon a forty-year march through the desert. I can find no other term for the path of suffering the fulfilment of the treaty prescribes for us." An attempt was made to ratify with reservations regarding the agreement for the trial of the Kaiser and the giving up of other war offenders, together with evidence. President Ebert signed the ratification at once and the formal document was forwarded to Versailles. The blockade of Germany was lifted on July 11.

GERMANY'S NAVAL LOSS. Official figures of Germany's naval losses were made public July 8, showing a loss of 490 war craft. Nearly 200 U-boats were lost, and 29,685 men of the naval forces were killed.

PRESIDENT COMES HOME. The President's transport, the George Washington, reached New York on July 8, docking at Hoboken. The ship was escorted into port by 5 dreadnaughts, 40 destroyers, a dirigible balloon, and a fleet of airplanes. The President went at once to Carnegie Hall where he made a short address telling the people how glad he was to be home and telling them that he had a great many undelivered speeches in his system, but they were all speeches that came from his mind, and he wanted then to say just a few words from his heart. From Carnegie Hall he went to the Pennsylvania Station where he boarded a special train for Washington. Thousands of people lined the streets and the Chief Executive received a most enthusiastic and hearty welcome. The President's train reached Washington before midnight where a cheering crowd of 10,000 people were waiting to welcome him.

ARGENTINA FIRST TO RATIFY. The Senate of the Argentine republic on July 7 by a unanimous vote approved the League of Nations Covenant, without reservation.

ITALIANS AND FRENCH CLASH. French and Italian troops in the garrison at Fiume have been in several clashes, the last on July 7. Some of the French soldiers were accused of having cheered for Jugoslavia. The French general in command, however, took energetic steps to punish the offenders, and the disorders ended with 6 killed and 20 wounded. An attempt to embark Jugoslav troops, in the rear of the armistice line held by Italian forces was given up after an Italian torpedo boat had threatened to sink the transport. The situation was giving Allied leaders considerable disquietude and operated to hasten the final decision which Foreign Minister Tittoni announced, in the Italian Chamber of Deputies on July 11, might be expected within a week.

PACKING AGREEMENT CONTINUES. The U. S. Department of Labor announced that representatives of the international unions cooperating in the packing industry have agreed to continue the present agreement between the packers and the President's Mediation Commission for the period of one year after the ending of the war.

The plan will carry with it not only a continuation of the present arrangements during the period of one year after the declaration of peace with the 5 big packers, but 15 other packing plants in Chicago will come under the same arrangement.

On April 12, 1919, Secretary Wilson was notified by the presidents of the five large packing-house plants in Chicago that they were willing to continue the agreement existing during war time for one year after peace is declared.

Representatives of the Department of Labor held conferences in Chicago for several days with the presidents of the packing houses and their representatives and with the president of the Amalgamated Association of Meat Cutters and the representatives of the other crafts involved in the packing-house industry, and finally worked out a plan which was satisfactory to both sides and which was submitted to the various crafts involved.

MEXICO NEXT. President Wilson returned to his desk in the White House on July 9 and spent the day in a concentrated attack upon accumulated business. It was reported that one of the first problems which he would have to solve would be the problem of Mexico. The State Department has been quoted as authority for the statement that repeated representation to the Carranza Government demanding protection for American citizens and punishment for those guilty of outrages have been of no avail. There were reports also that pressure was being brought to bear on this government by France, Britain and Italy, and the impression prevailed that the patience of the world with Mexico was about exhausted, and that the President would soon go before Congress with a statement of the Mexican situation. American intervention to restore law and order was suggested as among the possibilities.

EMPLOYERS AID LABOR. Under the leadership of Harold F. McCormick of the International Harvester Company and Harold Swift of Swift & Co., 40 of Chicago's great corporations have united in a project through which it is hoped to create a more cordial feeling between employers and employees. A community service organization is to be created which will arrange entertainments, lectures, seek means of improving working conditions and display sympathy, helpfulness and mutual interest. Leading employers of Toledo, Ohio, have also sent an invitation to Samuel Gompers to meet John N. Willys of the Willys-Overland Company in a public conference, in which representatives of both employers and labor will take part.

TO SAVE THE KAISER. A great many people in Germany appear to be horrified at the thought that the Kaiser is to suffer a trial at the hands of the Entente. On July 8 it was reported that thousands were ready to rally around the former Emperor to prevent his trial. All five of Wilhelm's sons have offered to be tried in his place. Prince Henry of Prussia, the ex-Emperor's brother, in a letter to King George, promised to assist the King in bringing to light the truth regarding the war and its consequences, and begged the King his influence to prevent the thr trial. The British press oppos ing the trial in London, fearing and charges of unfairness, and ing reluctant to give Germany illustrious martyr.

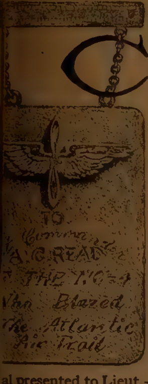
Columbus—Center of Gravity, and Jollity

Wonderful Scenes and Amazing Crowds at the Methodist Centenary Celebration

By ANNA BIRD STEWART



al presented to Lieut.-Comm. Read

"COLUMBUS!" called the conductor.

The little wife of the country minister got off the train. She felt a bit timid. It was the first time in her thirty years of married life that she had ever been so far from home alone. But then the minister had never hurt his ankle before, either. They had kept waiting, and hoping that he would be able to make the trip. And here it was the very last day of the Methodist Centenary Celebration. Nothing to do but for the little wife to come alone, and try to see enough for both.

A huge lettered sign stretched before her.

"Welcome, Centenari- she read. "That means me, too," she thought. she giggled to herself, a timid little giggle, not to public appearances. "I may be a Centenarian, I feel mighty young for my years."

was a long trip on the street car out to the Ohio Fair Grounds. But then little Mrs. Minister ot have time to think about it. All around her le were talking.

Vell, well," she heard one man say to another, it brought you here from San Francisco?"

reat show," admitted the other. "No age limits. es a million, and all of 'em different."

ch a lot of facts the little wife collected from omments around her:

ere was an Eskimo baby just eight weeks old e grounds, and a real Wild West Show.

boy announced that they had built there the st movie screen in the world, one hundred and n feet square, and it takes six men to work ntern.

woman across the aisle told her companion that the Chinese kiddies were Christian children from New York's Chinatown, but that the Zulu prince came straight from Africa, and expects to study at Ohio State University.

There were elephants and camels, monkeys and sacred cows, free picture shows and a post office.

She learned that by means of wireless telephones and megaphones a real sky pilot had preached the first aerial sermon here from a dirigible to a congregation two thousand feet away.

SHE made up her mind to see the Kaffir exhibit, now that she knew that coffee was first grown there, and to find these representatives from thirty American Indian tribes.

She, too, would have a chance to hear the great organ played by Professor Kraft of Columbia, and the weird call of the camel drivers, and shouts from the children's playground where, she heard one woman declare, swings and slides spoke as eloquently to little Oriental ears as to American.

Little Mrs. Minister followed the others off the car and found her way inside the gates.

A band was playing. A horde of visitors were darting hither and yon. It was all very confusing.

She bought what the boy vendor called "a progrum of the day," thinking, "I must pick out what Henry would have liked to see."

The largeness of her choice overwhelmed her further. Mercy me! There were exhibits and life plays and pageants from every country she had ever heard about and some that she hadn't.

"I should have studied geography harder," she told herself. "Now there's Malaysia, and all I know is that it was over on the right-hand side of the map."

Near by she saw a young woman also studying a program. She felt, suddenly, very friendly with all the world. "The man on the car had called Columbus the center of jollity," she reminded herself. She turned to the girl.

"Do you know where Malaysia is in Columbus?" she asked her. "I want to find out if it's as pink as it used to be on the map!"

The girl laughed. "It's turned green on the map I teach from. Are you headed there? Let's go together."

"I'm not headed anywhere. I think I've lost my head entirely. You see, I have only today, and I have to see everything."

The teacher took charge of the situation at once. "Then first of all you must see about the Pageant. There are other pageants too, you know, but when we pronounce it with a capital this way, we mean 'The Wayfarer.' It's been a wonderful success. Yesterday they had a line of people half a mile long waiting to buy tickets. You'll have more chance if you don't mind going to the matinée."

Still talking, the teacher led her over toward a line of visitors.

"There's luck," she exclaimed; "wait here." And she darted away.

Before the little woman could even see where she had gone, her guide was back again.

"A friend of mine was almost at the window when I saw her," she explained. "She got your ticket along with her own. And now, if you're willing, suppose we walk around together for a while."

from a crowded African kraal to a Russian ikon-decked chapel, took but a few steps. And everywhere they glimpsed Christianity with human progress, hand in hand. Little Mrs. Minister gasped at the wonder of it all.

"Of course," explained the teacher, "I'm interested most in the lives of these different peoples, and in their schools. I used to laugh at missionaries. I believe it was the mission schools that made me consider them with respect, either that or what a man called Dan Ward once wrote, that if it hadn't been for missionary faith and pioneering, we'd all still be dressed in skins, and still be traded for a string of beads or a young cow."

"Maybe that is the lesson of this exposition," suggested the minister's wife; "to introduce the missionaries' achievements to an indifferent world. But I keep losing my breath over again every minute, it's all so big, and there's so much of it. And to think a million people have seen it, and know."

They followed the crowd toward a huge building, past rows of lunch stands.

"The boys I teach will want to hear about these speeches," said the teacher.

WONDERFUL men had been heard in that Coliseum during the Celebration; the great churchmen of the country, public men too—Taft and Bryan, McAdoo and Daniels, and many more. The mighty voice of John R. Mott had carried to the farthest corners of the vast auditorium—and to the world beyond—the story of the last hundred years of missions, the need for a new program commensurate with the opportunities of the coming century. But the cheers had but gained in volume for this last day's ovation to the pioneer voyager of the trackless air, Lieutenant-Commander A. C. Read, who sailed the NC-4 across the Atlantic, and to the mountaineer hero, the "one-man army," Sergeant Alvin C. York.

"A gentle*man*
Is spick and span,"

Mrs. Minister hummed from the old nursery rhyme, when trim Commander Read arose to foretell the future triumphs of aviation. Then Sergeant York spoke on the power of prayer.

"I prayed when I went into battle, and I prayed every second that I fought." And he added, simply, "I know that it was in answer to prayer alone that no German scratch is on me."

The uncounted masses in the great hall cheered and swayed forward, impelled by a single desire—to shake hands with their heroes.

"What's the raging Atlantic or a hundred Huns to that mob?" demanded a presiding official. "Quick, slip out this way, or they'll smother us."

And two of the acknowledged bravest men of modern times ran away, downright scared! And of nothing more than those enthusiastic men, women and children, a mere ten thousand or so!

Later that day Mrs. Minister saw Sergeant York again at the demonstration of the great Mass Movement of India.

The Indian village was crowded. Native Christians were singing a hymn in Hindustani, strumming lightly on a kind of Indian guitar.

Here sat York, all reverent attention while the Chaudri, or village leader, besought the missionary to receive his villagers into the Christian fold. And there were not enough Christian workers in India to do the baptizing, not to mention teaching.

"You preach 'Come to Jesus Christ,' and when we come, you send us back."

A deeply religious man himself, York felt strongly this little fragment of the tragedy of India's soul life. The Minister's wife watched his serious freckled face, seemingly older than she had imagined he would look. Then the scene was ended.

THERE was time for but a glance as they cut through the Latin-America exhibits shortly after, and came face to face with France. The glow from the great rose window over the battered altar of the Cathedral represented there, seemed to linger upon the little wife's face as they passed on. At a model of the Château-Thierry district her cheeks flushed again with pride. Here her boys had held the Huns back. Here her church was rebuilding twelve of the surrounding villages.

"A monument of gladness is the most beautiful to build," she said.

"That, I think, expresses the spirit of this whole exposition," answered the teacher. "Other World's Fairs have dwelt on commerce, on material progress and invention. Here the emphasis is on the sacredness of humanity, on what the Church has tried to do for the greater welfare and happiness of all the world."

They had reached the threshold of the great hall again. A moment later they parted.

"And she'll never know how much she has done for me," sighed the little wife.

In the dim half-lights of the Coliseum she looked about her. And soon she began to talk to her new neighbors. After all, the world was just one big family.

THE REAL BOLSHEVIST

By NEVIN O. WINTER

MR. WINTER has gone to the roots of Bolshevism and after a fair and full investigation has failed to find in it a single redeeming feature. He has written the results of his European inquiry in this article, and we trust our readers to give it as wide publicity as possible.

I SOME American agitators should come to Moscow or Budapest and start an agitation gainst the existing government, what would be done with them?" I asked of a Russian vist leader whom I met.

en if Bolshevist propagandists are discovered to upset the governments of England and the States, what sort of punishment should be out to them?" was the next question, which en suggested by his statement re were fifty thousand agitators l in spreading propaganda the workers in these two great Saxon countries.

Bolshevist attempted to avoid ing this pointed question, but d upon an answer, and it finally "If the authorities wish to stop it y thing to do is to shoot them." ievists are of many kinds and of radicalism. Therefore one counter many varying opinions them as well as about them.

In certain sense the Bolshevist is mitive man. All the restraint of laws and the traditions that rown up with the centuries have holly removed, so that the naked ands forth. As a result many n revert to the stone age, where alone made right, where there privileges excepting those which be maintained by brute force.

matter of fact many of the Bolshevist leaders t members of the proletariat, in the strictest They are not men who have been accustomed their living by the sweat of their brow, to use a n expression. They are really apostatized ers of the bourgeois element who veer whichay the breeze blows strongest or in whatever on opportunism calls them. They are like the vative in our own country who changes to a l when the signs of the times point that way.

E reads affirmations and heated denials of some particular outcroppings of Bolshevism, and both e. For instance, we hear the charge made by ble persons, and denied by others just as reputaat the Bolshevists are attempting to communize n, that they are publicly teaching atheism, that f bloodshed have arisen which almost put to the red terror of the French Revolution. All se things have occurred in sections, while in nothing of the kind has been attempted.

Bolshevist leaders disagree among themselves any of them refuse to obey the so-called central rities. With all laws of the former régime abol with every precedent and tradition thrown to ur winds of the universe, each leader begins to be hat he is a law unto himself and that his own are as good as those of any other self-consti leader.

e not right in a sense? Upon what authority the dictatorship of Tenine or Trotzky? What ar will has placed the mantle upon the shoulders la Kun, the disciple and protégé of Lenine? was it made Stutzger the high and mighty arbiter destinies of the Letts at Riga, until that city urrendered? It has been simply the authority might and the ability to grasp opportunity has them. Hence it is that the leaders of other secof former Russia have the same right to claim a f omniscience for themselves in order to propatheories which seem good to themselves but may approved for various reasons by the other leaders. cepting the charges of wholesale executions there robably been no charge made against the Bolshehich has brought forth such heated denials from gists for Bolshevism as the allegations concerning reaking down of the marriage relation. The n has been that such a course seemed so alien to zation. I have the solemn word of a Polish genn who lived in Moscow for a year after Lenine into power that the charges are true. He is a whom I knew before the war and have met frequently since. His word I believe absolutely. No woman, said he, was safe. If a member of the proletariat army demanded the wife or daughter of a member of the bourgeoisie as his wife, the demand must be complied with. For that reason the few members of this class who remained in Moscow kept themselves in hiding and concealed their whereabouts by skilful bribery, for in that was their only salvation.

Types of Ukrainian Bolshevist prisoners captured by the Polish troops around Lemberg.

That a loose marriage relation is a part of the radical social scheme is not unknown. This position is adopted by all Bolshevists. In Budapest, where the outward manifestations of Bolshevism have been milder than in Russia until recently, this attitude is somewhat camouflaged. Yet I have the written statement of Comrade Hevesi, People's Commissary for Socialization, as follows:

"Will not marriage cease?" was the question asked.

"It will not cease," was the answer, "but it will be accompanied by much less formality, and much easier to divorce than up to now. Probably a divorce can be effected simply by both parties agreeing to it."

This is simply a politic way of saying that the marriage relation can be entered into and terminated at will by the parties. If there are to be no formalities about the separation, then there is no need whatsoever for formalities about the beginning. The Hungarian Bolshevists are more careful in their statements than those of Russia, for the reason that they do not wish to wholly alienate the civilized world. Their ultimate purposes, however, are one and the same.

The leaders at Budapest adopt and approve of the extreme measures of Lenine, Trotzky and associates. Is Lenine sorry or penitent over the overt acts of himself and his followers, which have aroused the indignation of the civilized world? Read the following from his own pen: "When the workers and laboring peasants took hold of the powers of state, it became our duty to quell the resistance of the exploiting class. We are proud that we have done it. We only regret that we did not do it at the beginning with sufficient firmness and decision."

BELA KUN was one of Lenine's secretaries for a year or more and has fully imbibed the most extreme phases of Russian Bolshevism. Because of the situation of Hungary, hemmed in by anti-Bolshevist countries, milder measures were advisable. So long as the passions were not aroused by counter-revolutionary movements, executions were held in abeyance, even though I was convinced the spirit was there. The dispatches today, as I write, are carrying the news of the execution of twoscore students in the Budapest Military Academy. Why? Solely as a reprisal. Guilty or not, these youths must suffer. At the same time this self-constituted leader, who is not a real proletariat, issues a proclamation, which reads in part: "Since proper appreciation of the mild treatment of the past three months (it dates from March 21) has not been shown, blood shall flow henceforth, if necessary, to insure the protection of the proletariat."

The story is very much the same wherever Bolshevism has penetrated, excepting that there are certain variations. The stone age has been resurrected with all its cruelties. In fact, in some respects it is intensified because of the teaching of class hatred. The stone man killed only in anger or to obtain food. The Bolshevik destroys the members of a class either in cold blood or by the slow process of starvation in denying them food. Class hatred is far more bitter than mere racial hatred, which has also been responsible for many horrors in history, as the French Revolution bears terrible witness.

At Reval I was shown a photo of scores of bodies of slain Esthonians, taken at the university town of Dorpat and exhibited to me by an American army officer. They were generally people of the bourgeois class, although there were some professors of the university and students who would not embrace Bolshevistic teaching. I saw a picture of two men killed just a few miles from Vilna by the Bolsheviks during their retreat from that city. These men were property owners and their bodies had been so horribly mutilated before death that it would be impossible to reproduce the pictures in any periodical.

An American captain, who entered Riga just two days after the Bolsheviks evacuated that important Baltic city, related to me how twoscore of the leading citizens were executed, for the bodies had not yet been interred when he arrived. The intention had been to execute about two hundred more prisoners held in the jail, but the Bolshevists did not have time, for the enemy advanced too rapidly. Because some cruel Letts and mercenary Chinese in the employ of the armies operating under the banner of the Moscow government perform these deeds, this fact does not clear the skirts of Lenine and Trotzky, who are the responsible leaders of that government.

"I am going to shoot a few Bolshevists in America, if they try to make trouble after I get home," said an American army officer to me in Berlin. He had been in charge of a Russian prison camp near Munich during almost the entire existence of the communistic government in that city. "I saw scores of bodies lying in the street, men, women and children, and some of the former officials whom I knew were executed in cold blood," said he. I have never talked with a man who was so deeply wrought up over the sights which he had witnessed than was this splendid representative of our army officers.

From Kiev I have heard tales equally as astonishing and almost as incredible, if one did not have confidence in the party relating them.

The Bolshevist leaders are determined to win, no matter what the cost. They are endeavoring to undermine every government where there seems the slightest possibility of success. By following such a course of action Bolshevism becomes a menace to the entire world. A situation is presented which cannot be ignored. Its solution demands the wisdom of our wisest leaders.

Wilson Confers With Senators

PRESIDENT WILSON, on July 17, began a series of conferences at the White House with Republican members of the Senate whom he had invited to call, and on the 18th he went to the capitol and held a long conference with Senator Hitchcock. It was expected the President would explain Article 10 of the Peace Treaty, the Shantung settlement and the provisions regarding the Monroe Doctrine, and though the Senators concerned would not talk, an impression gained currency that the opposition to ratification was lessening under the influence of his explanations. The conferences were interrupted on July 21 by a slight illness which sent the President to bed.

The Senate, on July 15, adopted a resolution asking the President to submit copies of an alleged secret treaty of alliance negotiated between Germany and Japan last October, in which the two nations expected to divide the commercial advantages of Russia between themselves. This treaty, it appears, was made public through Bolshevist sources and is not considered valid in official circles. A resolution was also passed asking for all of the stenographic records of the Supreme Council bearing on the League of Nations, and for all of the plans proposed by the delegations from the different countries. The Senate debate concerned itself particularly with the Shantung settlement, which was defended by the President's supporters, as a measure of expediency.

Senator Borah described the cession of Shantung to Japan as a bribe handed to that country to secure her signing of the Peace Treaty and participation in the League of Nations. Both he and Senator Lodge declared the Shantung agreement a crime delivering 40,000,000 citizens of an Allied nation to a foreign power. Senator Colt, Republican, of Rhode Island, declared that the United States must see through to the end the great undertaking upon which we embarked in entering the war, and this could only be done by our becoming a member of the League. He declared that the League of Nations in its essence was simply an association of free nations. He had not been impressed by the constitutional objections raised to the form of the League Covenant, and his mind was still open on the question of reservations.

The uncertainty as to the final action of the Senate on the Peace Treaty was said to be embarrassing the American delegation in Paris in its participation in the formation of various commissions provided for by the treaty.

It was reported on July 20 that Senator Lodge had received assurances from a British statesman that Britain and France would accept the reservations to the treaty considered necessary by the American Senate. Senator Lodge was confident that reservations would be made in some form; Senator Hitchcock was equally confident that the treaty would be ratified without change.

RETRIBUTION is hot on the heels of the men who authorized the great war and its cruelties. On July 11 a Turkish court martial condemned to death three of the war leaders of the government—Talaat Bey, Djemel Pasha and Enver Pasha. The prosecutions were the climax of efforts by the new régime in Turkey to clear its skirts of war guilt. Enver Pasha was minister of war and ordered the Armenian massacres; Talaat Bey was Grand Vizier, and Djemel Pasha was military governor of Syria. Talaat and Djemel fled to Germany last October, being followed by Enver Pasha. This picture shows Talaat Bey in Berlin. Turkey is seeking to extradite the three men.

AUSTRIA GETS TERMS. The Austrian delegation at Paris on July 20 received the final sections of the Allied Terms of Peace. The Austrian army is to be reduced to 30,000 officers and men, to be raised by volunteering, conscription being forbidden. The Hungarian province of Oldenburg is ceded to Austria, and Czecholsovakia is given a bridgehead on the Danube opposite Pressburg. Austria's pre-war debt is to be divided pro rata between the old Austria and the territories separated from her, and Austria is to pay an indemnity in a reasonable sum, to be determined by a commission, payments to extend over thirty years. She is also to return to Italy certain historical and art objects, is to pay part of her reparation in livestock and is to repair invaded areas.

RACE RIOTS IN CAPITAL. Enraged by a series of assaults upon white women by negroes in Washington, and by the failure of the police to apprehend the assailants, American soldiers, sailors and marines, with some civilians, began a series of indiscriminate attacks on negroes in all parts of the city, on July 19 and 20. The provost guard and police reserves were kept busy answering riot calls. Many negroes were injured, a police officer was shot, and a large number of whites were arrested.

BRITISH AIRSHIP BURNS. The British airship NS-11 a veteran of the war with a long-distance record was burned in an electrical storm, on July 15, falling into the sea off the Norfolk coast. Two officers and ten men lost their lives. It was thought that the ship was struck by lightning. During her fighting days the ship had flown over 1.000 miles over the North Sea on a submarine hunting expedition. She was destroyed while searching for a trawler reported in distress.

VARIOUS STRIKES. The surface, elevated and subway transportation of Boston was tied up completely on July 17 by a strike of the employees of the Boston Elevated Railway Company. The strike was called by the men against the advice of their leaders, the men having become impatient over the delay of the War Labor Board in hearing their case. A board of arbitration was hastily constituted and an award of an eight-hour day and material increases in wages ended the strike on July 20. All the electric railways of Rhode Island were tied up on July 19 by a strike.

The attempt to institute a general strike in France, which has been more or less continuous for a couple of months was reported on July 17 to be meeting opposition from all parts of the country with a probability that it would never be called. The same attempt in Italy was also meeting failure.

The British miners on July 17 decided unanimously to cooperate with the Government in putting into operation economies in the coal industry, "provided that the Government would proceed with the nationalization of the mines. On July 17 the strike of the transport workers in Berlin was broken.

In Chicago a strike of building trade workers was being met with a threat of a lockout by the employers' organization, 1,300 firms and 115,000 w being involved, while 10,000 me on strike at the McCormick Har shops, were faced with a lockout.

INTERNATIONAL MEET OF CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

Rev. John Pollock

"ONE is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren."

It is with this stimulus in their hearts and with the vision of a world redeemed that the great Christian Endeavor host gathers for its twenty-seventh International Convention at Buffalo, N. Y., August 5–10, 1919.

The great group of Christian Endeavorers in this country (four millions strong) have been "carrying on" in a remarkable way during the war period in a great war service program. Under their special Christian Endeavor "Army of Universal Patriotic Service" they have done great things for the preservation of the nation and of democracy. There has been no falling off in attendance or in gifts. The taking of 140,000 Christian Endeavorers by the draft was only a stimulus to greater activity in securing new members.

President United Society of Christian Endeavor

The gains have been considerable in the regular societies and the organization of the new "Christian Endeavor Alumni" or "Veterans'" Associations has gone on apace. Christian Endeavor in the South has had a wonderful revival. Mississippi was the first State in the Union to reach and pass the goal of enrolments in the Army of Universal Patriotic Service. Camp Hancock, Augusta, Ga., became a strong center of Christian impulse through the 3,000 Pennsylvania enlisted Endeavorers in training there.

Prayer and works have gone hand in hand. In Colorado, the leaders of the Christian Endeaver Societies used Kodak prayer books containing pictures of men in the service for whom prayers were constantly offered. Testaments were provided men in Kansas camps. Funds have been provided by Connecticut Endeavorers for Armenian Relief; by an Illinois member for comforts for enlisted men; by Oregon societies for the equipping of Y huts overseas; and religious work has been done among men in camps, hospitals and ships in all parts of the country. The new Christian Endeavor headquarters (a stately six-story structure costing $217,000, situated on the summit of historic Beacon Hill, Boston) has been dedicated during the past year, contributions for which came from all parts of the world. The spirit of this event was voiced by the gifted Dr. Amos R. Wells, trustee of the World's Christian Endeavor Union and a lifelong Endeavorer, in an expressive poem of dedication, one verse of which reads:

J. Mason Prough

Dr. Charles M. Sheldon

Rev. W. A. Jones

"To the living Church of God,
Spread through all the world abroad,
Herald of the open gate,
This its house we dedicate."

The whole world has been from its beginning the field of Christian Endeavor expansion. The World's Union gives each year a grant of $2,000 to China (with its 1,200 societies); the same amount to India, Burma and Ceylon; and $1,000 to Japan, where fourteen denominations are represented in 222 societies. Christian Endeavor Societies have recently been formed in all except four of the states of Brazil. Norway has 150 societies. Egypt has 72; South Africa over 500; Australia and and New Zealand over 2,000; the West Indies 280; and the total enrolment of Christian Endeavor societies around the world now reaches over 80,000. One of the greatest of all missionary agencies, Christian Endeavor aids the work of all denominations around the globe.

This great host of Christian young people is now mobilizing the World's Christian Endeavor Army of Universal, Permanent and Domestic Peace.

The World Union Committee of three in every society everywhere is the leverage for the promotion of the united brotherly world which is to follow the world war, and for the promotion of the far-reaching 1919–1921 Christian Endeavor campaign presented and adopted at the Buffalo, New York, International Christian Endeavor Conference in August, 1919.

Among the great themes listed for addresses and conferences are "Spiritual Power and How to Gain It"; "World Peace and Patriotism"; "Making Americans"; "The Industrial Problem"; and "What the Community has a Right to expect from the Church". Rallies are arranged for Christian Endeavor experts in missionary, evangelistic, junior, intermediate, army and navy, prison, hospital, press rural and family endeavor, efficiency and social work; for "Tenth Legioners"; "Comrades of the Quiet Hour"; "Christian Endeavor Alumni"; "Life Work Recruits". There are (besides the usual consecration, denominational, fellowship outdoor services, etc.) the unique memorial service for the heroic dead, the presentation of Christian Endeavor soldiers, marines, sailors and aviators; and great patriotic and world pageants.

Among the notable speakers are leaders of public life and government service and of Christian work in this and other lands, including Rev. John Pollock, president, European Christian Endeavor Union; Dr. B. F. Price, China; Dr. J. H. Pettee, Japan; Bishop Kyles, Africa; Rev. S. G. Inman, Latin America; Major (Rev.) Charles W. Gordon ("Ralph Conner"), Canada; Dr. R. H. Conwell and F. W. Tomkins, Phila., Pa.; President H. L. Freeman; Dr. H. B. Grose; Dr. R. W. Miller; Dr. J. C. Caldwell; Dr. R. W. Brokaw; Dr. Thomas Ashburn; Dr. J. C. White; Dr. N. B. Griebb; Dr. F. E. Clark, founder, and many other Endeavor leaders. The convention will record achievements realized and, recognizing the new spirit of the world, will plan to turn the power of consecrated youth to wider accomplishment.

It has been fully demonstrated that by actively enlisting in practical church work the previously unappropriated power of the young people, Christian Endeavor has invigorated and revivified the influence of the Church, and has promoted Christian fellowship around the globe. And Christian Endeavor may be depended upon to keep alive the flame of zeal and high desire which is kindled for most people when life is young, and to promote with highest, consecrated efficiency the world-wide democratic, humanitarian and religious ideals of the new era now heralded, with the conclusion of the Peace treaty.

ANY DAY AT ALL

By
MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A LITTLE letter from a pen-and-ink friend of mine was handed to me yesterday. It was a welcome-home letter filled with good wishes and the sunshine of affection, and it ended this way:

"You have had such a wonderful trip overseas and have seen such wonderful things that I can't help thinking that perhaps it is a little dull for you, now that you are again at your desk. I can't help thinking that perhaps you are a trifle bored as you go back and forth from your office. After France, and Belgium, and Germany, New York must seem very commonplace."

This is my answer to the letter.

I got up this morning at the usual time, and put on a new dress, and started for the office. The new dress was a pretty one and I like pretty dresses. Maybe my pleasure in it started the morning in an exceptionally nice way—maybe the sky was bluer than usual and the sun a shade brighter. I don't know.

I got into a trolley car. It was quite full of people. Perhaps it was the consciousness of the new dress that made me want to smile at every one of them—perhaps it was because of the blue sky and the golden sun. Perhaps they were quite as happy as I. For they seemed ready to smile, too.

There was a woman sitting opposite me with her tiny son. He was eating a lollypop and he chuckled engagingly at each sticky-sweet mouthful. And there was a lovely spick-and-span old gentleman who wore a spicy garden pink in the buttonhole of his black coat. It wasn't a city flower and I found myself thinking suddenly of sun-dials, and country stone walls with the glory of honeysuckle twined over them.

Next to me there was a girl in a fresh green frock. Her hair was very dark but when the sunlight touched it—it flashed with an unexpected glow of color. I fell to watching the sunbeams as they sought out that color, fell to thinking of them as fingers that were straying gently, lovingly, across the girl's head. The fingers of an angel, maybe, an angel who hadn't been in heaven long enough to stop missing the earth.

After a while I changed cars. As I paid my fare to the new conductor I noticed that his face was familiar.

"Haven't I seen you before?" I questioned.

He laughed.

"Not for two years," he answered. "I used to come over on the car with you almost every day before that. But I've been on a submarine destroyer ever since we got into the war." He laughed again. "I've just been discharged from the service," he told me, "and I'm back on the old job. Only I'm not going to stay on the old job long. This war seems to have put a new ambition into me."

The second car went through the slums of New York. It is hot now in the city and the slums seem to be the heat center. I saw half-dressed babies lying on the pavements—tired looking old women who sat limply in dark doorways. On one corner a push-cart man was selling thin slices of watermelon to the hungry little children who had pennies. Other equally hungry children who hadn't pennies watched wistfully as he dealt out his wares.

The car crept through the slums. A car can never go very quickly in the crowded districts. It seemed to me that it shot through a blaze of color—through a maze of nations. New York's foreign quarter is always thrilling with the hint of old world faces—mysterious with the memory of other cities.

My office is not far from the slums, and so the trolley car, bringing me through the busy streets, left me only a few steps from my destination. The Bible House seemed strangely calm as I went through the door of it—a bulwark of strength set in the turmoil and change of the city. The Bible House is an old building, and not undignified.

I went through the doorway and up in the elevator to the fifth floor. My office is on the fifth floor. A woman with tired eyes stood beside me. She was dressed all in black. And her voice trembled when she asked the elevator man where she could purchase a pocket Testament.

There were letters waiting for me in my office—the first mail had been sorted. I read them eagerly, for my letters are always like so many adventures to me. There was a note from a girl who is going to be a missionary, another from a woman who wants to write poetry. There was a letter with a check in it, and a letter from a soldier who is on his way home. There was a great bulky envelope from a lonely woman on a farm, and a slim typewritten envelope from a girl who works in a great city. And there was a letter marked "personal" in large black writing.

I read my letters, and wrote a poem, and went over some manuscripts. And then, suddenly, it was lunch time, and I wandered across the street to a restaurant on the top floor of a certain department store. Soft music was playing and people all over the room had stopped talking to listen to it. Because every table was occupied I sat down opposite a little old lady with white hair. She nodded pleasantly and when the music had swept on to its dreamy close she spoke.

"That piece makes me think of one that the violins played at my first party," she said in a sweetly thin voice, "nearly sixty years ago it must have been! I wasn't much over sixteen then, and I wore a white dotted Swiss dress with a blue sash, and carried a bouquet of moss rosebuds in a cone of lace paper."

The afternoon went busily on. One of the girls in the building came in to show me a new ring on the third finger of her left hand. She was blushing. And a friend from far away called quite unexpectedly. And there were more letters at three o'clock, letters brimming with worlds of interest. And after I had finished reading them I answered as many as I could.

And then I started home. I take the subway at night; it's quicker than the surface car, although it's usually crowded. The crowd seemed very tired but not at all unhappy. Just in front of me a girl stood with a tall, gaunt young man. His serge suit was shiny and her hat was a last year's hat—but they looked into each other's eyes with a radiance of expression that made me glance away. I felt that I had stumbled into the music of a love song.

A woman down the aisle clung to a strap with one moist tired hand. She was a stout, middle-aged woman and no one would have accused being romantic. But in her other ha carried a faded red rose. It was a ve grant rose, even though it was faded!

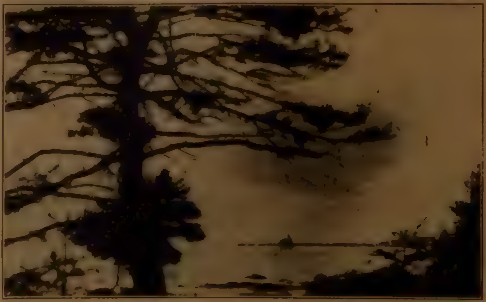
I walked from the subway to my hom rather a long walk—but it's a pleasa All along the street folk were going t homes, and little children were callin night to each other. I saw a man pause steps of a brownstone house to kiss the who was waiting for him. And in the w of another house I saw a mother rocking to sleep. She was singing softly—som nursery rhyme song it was—and her ey very tender. I might have been watc Madonna picture come to life.

I walked on. I was walking toward th as well as toward home. And suddenl walked I saw the sky take on a wonderfu glow, and saw the drifting clouds turn t And I saw the sun, flaming and breat beautiful, slip through the rose and th It, too, was going home for the night!

Oh, friends of mine, no day is ever dull no one need be bored—ever. Not whil is a world full of people, and color, an shine, and smiles, and song. Not wh whole universe is alive with the won pulsing human hearts that are striving breathing human souls that are reaching t some goal!

One does not have to cross a sea to fi venture. One doesn't have to go three sand miles to find romance. Romanc adventure can be found very near home. people can sit in a tenement window a the same time be wandering in an ench land beside an enchanted sea—if their ey see clearly enough!

Friends of mine, if the world that you l seems commonplace, if your everyday lif bit tiresome, ask yourself if you are looki it in the right way. For a city street or a try lane can be just as worth while as the of some exciting book, if you want it to be! home or your office can be a wonderful rom if your heart is tuned to the music of rom And the people all about you can be a cinating as the people in the great h drama, if your soul is the sort of a soul adventuring.



From a City Window

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE dust is thick on the city streets,
The smoke on the city sky
Hangs dense and gray at the close of day—
And the city crowds surge by
With heavy feet through the summer heat
Like a sluggish sullen tide; . . .
But hand in hand through a magic land
We are wandering side by side.

For somewhere, dear, there's a magic land
On the shores of a silver sea;
And there is a boat with turquoise sails—
With sails that are wide and free;
A boat that is whirling through the spray,
That is coming for you and me!

Somewhere, dear, there's a singing breeze
That creeps through the laughing air
To the wide-flung boughs of a blue-black tree—
It touches your joyous hair;
And the touch of it is as soft and light
As a baby's lisping prayer.

Somewhere, dear, there's a bit of beach
Where the sand is warm and white;
Where the sky seems close, and the drifting clouds
Are tenderly, warmly bright.
And there is a ship with turquoise sails,
With sails like a living light!

Ah, the ship is bringing us dreams come true,
And hopes that are all dew-kissed;
It is bringing us days that are all aglow
With scarlet and amethyst; . . .
Bringing us faith to find our way
Through a world that is wrapped in mist.

Our window looks on the city street,
We can glimpse the city sky;
But our hearts are gay at the close of day,
Though the tired crowds pass by
With heavy feet through the blinding heat,
Like a sullen, sluggish tide, . . .
For hand in hand through a magic land
We are wandering side by side.

Mary nodded. "I see. The money isn't re necessary to God, is it? He can make all the gold wants to, can't he? What he loves is the cheer ness. I'll try to give him that after this."

Massacre at Chaiam

The following facts have been gath- from several independent sources erning the murders by the Japanese iers at Chaiam.

This massacre occurred on April soon after the noon hour. The was about 500 yards long and 160 yards wide, having about y houses and a Christian church.

"On this date a Japanese lieutenant, with a number of soldiers, appeared in the town and ordered twenty-three men into the church under the pretense of giving them a lecture. Among the number who obeyed the order were eleven Christian men. It is probable that nearly all the others were members of the Chundo Kyo. Among the former was a young man who escaped from the building after it was set on fire and tells the story of the massacre. He states that the lieutenant began haranguing the men he had called and finally asked them of the teaching of Christianity. The leader, named An, replied that the Bible taught good relationship among men, reverence for and service of God and final reward of heaven. The lieutenant answered that the Christians were acting contrary to this teaching, etc., and finally stepped out of the building.

Men Crumpled Up

"There were three sharp commands and the soldiers at the door fired into the church. Men seated on the floor crumpled up and fell over, but the testifying eye-witness did not know they were being shot, but thought that the soldiers were firing blank cartridges and the men were prostrating themselves because of fear.

"He hid behind the pulpit and rolled under a bench. Smoke immediately filled the building, when he and a Mr. Hong, who had so far escaped injury, climbed through a window above the pulpit and ran. Hong took the road through the town towards his home, but was shot on the outskirts of the town. The one who escaped ran for the small wooded hill at the back of the burning village. A soldier shot at him but missed, and he reached the top of the hill and escaped.

Woman's Head Cut Off

"Among the number ordered into the church was a young man by the name of Kang, who was the only support of a grandmother, a mother, aunt and wife. While the town was burning, his wife seized a bundle of bedding from her burning home and ran back of the earthen wall which formed the last structure on that side of the town. She was dressed in a clean skirt and a bright-colored jacket, was young and bright and therefore could easily be mistaken for a student. She had thrown her load down and was standing behind the wall looking through a broken place at the point where her husband had been shot and at her burning home. Suddenly a soldier came running down the hill at her. She turned and opened her lips to protest when the soldier swung his sword and with two blows cut off her head.

"This is told by an elderly woman who had also taken refuge behind the wall and stood only a few yards away. The soldier covered the body with the bedding and other blankets that had been saved from another home and also a pile of straw which lay near at hand and set all on fire.

Shot Fleeing Women

"The wife of Mr. Hong, on hearing the shooting, ran into the town and to the church, then finding the whole town on fire she ran for her home. As she passed from the village a soldier shot her twice. Later her two sons carried her home and she died that night.

"During the day, six men, all Christians, were called from their homes in the hamlet, just beyond the village, and shot.

"The soldiers entered the village of Acham, about twenty li west of Chaiam, and burned the town. A woman ran from the raiders and the soldiers followed her for more than a mile and shot her, the bullet taking effect in the back of the neck and passed out through the throat. She died without a word."

THE MORAL FAILURE IN KOREA

Responsibility of the Japanese Government and Nation

By ALBERTUS PIETERS

THE situation in Korea is serious. Serious for the Koreans, it is more serious for the Japanese people at large, and the most serious thing of all is that the Japanese, officials and people alike, appear to have no idea how serious a matter it really is.

Not to deal in any degree with unsupported rumor, let us consider the case of the massacre at Suigen (Korean reading Suwon), of which full and well authenticated reports appeared in the Japan Advertiser of April 27 and 29. In outline, the facts of the case are as follows:

Presumably as the result of local disturbances, the details of which have not been made public, a detachment of Japanese soldiers was sent to the village of Cheamni, near Suigen. No disturbance of the peace existed at the time of their arrival, but the men of the village were summoned to assemble in the Christian church, which they did, to the number of nearly 50, all entirely unarmed. What happened is not known in detail, but presently these men were all put to death and the building was burned over them.

Upon the facts being reported to the Governor-General by a delegation of missionaries, he admitted that these things had happened, assured his visitors that the persons responsible had been punished, and told them they might rest assured that there would be no recurrence of such happenings.

Notice, please, that this was not an act of war. No state of war exists in Korea, or could very well exist, as the people have been completely disarmed. Neither was it done by a few rowdy or intoxicated soldiers who had gotten out of hand, but by an organized detachment acting under orders of their regular officers. There was no resistance or riot to be quelled at the time. There was no judicial investigation of any alleged offense, although the courts are fully organized and regularly sitting in Korea. It was unprovoked, deliberate, cold-blooded murder, for which no sort of mitigation or excuse has been alleged.

What has been done about it, or is to be done about it?

A month has passed since these things were made public through the columns of the Japan Advertiser, and the world has been waiting with some impatience for an answer to that question. The Governor-General assured the missionaries that the persons responsible had been punished. I respectfully submit that this is not sufficient information. Who were held responsible, and what punishment was considered appropriate for such a crime? Has the officer who was in command of that detachment been court-martialed and shot? Or was he dismissed the service in disgrace, or suspended on half pay for a month or two, or reprimanded, or merely told to be good hereafter? Or has he been "punished" by being promoted to a higher post?

The question is a serious one. What, in the opinion of the High Command of the Japanese army, is a suitable punishment for a crime that has caused the blood to boil in the veins of every decent man that has heard of it throughout the world and that in Korea will "stir a fever in the blood of age and make the infant's sinews strong as steel." The degree of punishment meted out will be a fair index to the views of humanity and decency entertained by the masters of the military machine in Japan, and the world has a legitimate interest in knowing what these views are, for at the mercy of that machine are some 15 millions in Korea, with other millions in Formosa; and the same machine is to be the mandatory for certain wards of civilization in the Pacific.

Moreover, who are the persons "responsible"? Primarily, the officer in charge of the detachment, to be sure, but is he the only one? What is Governor-General Hasegawa's view of his own responsibility in this matter? He is in absolute command of the military forces of Japan in Korea. Only three possible hypotheses present themselves. Either this crime was carried out by his orders, or it was contrary to his orders, or he had failed to give such instructions to his forces that they could know it was contrary to his will. Let us exclude the first, for to admit it, in the face of his reply to the missionaries, would make the Governor-General out to be such a monster both of cruelty and of hypocrisy as we refuse to contemplate. If it was contrary to his orders, we have a lamentable spectacle of weakness and incompetence, for then we must believe that General Hasegawa has his soldiers so poorly under control that his orders are flagrantly disregarded. The third hypothesis is most acceptable, and agrees with his own declaration, for he assures his interviewers that nothing of the kind will happen again. He appears quite confident that a word from him will effectually put a stop to anything of the kind. That is quite as it should be; but then there remains this question: "Why was that word not spoken earlier?" The massacre at Suigen took place weeks after trouble began in Korea. Did it never occur to General Hasegawa that his troops might need instructions? . . . This only remaining theory really doesn't make the case much better for the Governor-General of Korea. Nearly 50 men are dead near Suigen because the Governor-General thought too late of ordering that they should not be murdered.

Tokyo is the nerve-center of the Empire, the home of meetings and demonstrations of every kind. I looked and hoped for some expression of indignation from the Japanese people originating there, but nothing happened; no indignation meeting, no burning protests in the press, no denunciation by any political party, no evidence of any kind of concern for the welfare of the Koreans, for the maintenance of righteousness, or for the honor of the Empire. I am reminded forcibly of what a friend said to me at the time of the "Conspiracy Case": "The trouble with the Japanese is that they lack the capacity for moral indignation at wrongs done to others." It really seems so. The "capacity for moral indignation" is lacking, and hence it is a matter of no concern to the Japanese, apparently, that unarmed Koreans are shot, bayoneted, and burned by men in the uniform of the Empire.

Do not the Japanese people see that such things inevitably affect the world's judgment of them?

Japan Promises Reforms in Korea

IN MAKING public a report on the atrocities inflicted upon native Christians and patriotic agitators in Korea, the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America announced that assurances were given on July 10 by Premier Hara and other anti-militarists in the Japanese Government that reforms "will be carried into effect as soon as the legal requirements of procedure to make them definite shall have been completed."

This assurance was received in answer

CHANSUNG'S CONFESSION

"Among all sinners I am the greatest. For days I have sat here unable to speak because my sin is so great"

"I must speak now even though I die"

CHAPTER XXIV

The Great Revival

DURING the three years since Chansung's conversion, a great change had come to Korea. Japan had won her war with Russia; but her soldiers were not withdrawn from Korea. A treaty was secured which gave Japan a protectorate over the peninsula. All Korea's foreign relations were to be attended to henceforth by Japan. Many saw that it was only a question of time till Japan would annex Korea.

There is no denying the worthlessness of the old Korean Government; but when has any people welcomed the loss of its flag and national life? Yet what could be done? Without army or navy or competent leaders, resistance was useless. A few foolish men went about trying to stir up the people, and only succeeded in embittering men's minds.

The Christian Church, being an integral part of the nation, did not escape the temptations of these days. There were many who wished to use the church for political ends, and when missionaries and Korean leaders opposed, they were accused of being enemies of Korea.

So much was the Church disturbed, so evidently was the spirit of hatred and strife undermining spiritual life and power, that the leaders were greatly concerned and united in prayer for a great revival, especially as the time drew near for the winter class in Pyeng Yang.

Nearly a thousand men attended this class from every section in South Pyeng An Province. During the day the class divided into sections for Bible study and conference; at night mass meetings for men were held at the Central Church.

The committee in charge of the class planned these night meetings with the definite purpose of impressing upon the whole Church the necessity of love and willingness to forgive all, even those considered enemies, for Christ's sake. The subjects of the night meetings were all chosen to this end, and the speakers night after night made the truth plain.

The interest was intense; but there was no special response till near the close of the class on Saturday evening, when a number of men arose with tears and confessed that they had been guilty of hating the Japanese and even their own brethren. This was what the leaders had been hoping and praying for, and they were greatly encouraged.

The next night, however, a strange thing happened. There was no response to the sermon whatever. The meeting seemed dead and cold, and the leaders went home feeling that all their efforts had failed; that the powers of darkness had set themselves against them that night and prevailed. Yet they knew they must receive a blessing; that a new spirit of love must come upon the Church, or it would be doomed.

In great perplexity and heaviness of heart, they met the next day and cried out to God for help, and that very night the answer came; came not alone in conviction of the sin of lack of love for which they had prayed, but in conviction of all sins; in an outpouring of the Spirit himself upon the Korean Church.

As Elder Kang preached, a solemn hush rested upon the great audience. Then Pastor Na came forward and called for prayers.

All over the building so many commenced to pray that Pastor Na said, "If you want to pray like that, all pray;" and the whole audience of nearly two thousand men broke out in prayer together.

The effect was indescribable; not confusion, but a vast harmony of sound and spirit; a mingling together of souls moved by an irresistible impulse of prayer. It sounded like the falling of many waters; an ocean of prayer beating against God's throne. It was not many, but one; born of one Spirit, lifted to one Father above.

Just as on the day of Pentecost, they were all together in one place of one accord praying. "And suddenly there came from heaven the sound as of the rushing of a mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting."

God is not always in the whirlwind, neither does he always speak in a still small voice. He came to Pyeng Yang that night in the sound of weeping. As the prayer continued, a spirit of heaviness and sorrow for sin came down upon the audience.

Over on one side some one began to weep, and in a moment the whole audience was weeping. Then, almost before the leaders realized what had happened, the great confessional began. Man after man would rise, confess his sins, break down and weep, and then throw himself to the floor and beat the floor with his fists in perfect agony of conviction. Sometimes after a confession the whole audience would break out in prayer together. Again, after another confession, they would break forth in uncontrollable weeping; and so the meeting went on until two o'clock in the morning.

Thus the great revival of nineteen hundred and seven began. Every sin a human being can commit was publicly confessed during this revival. Pale and trembling with emotion, in agony of mind and body, guilty souls standing in the white light of that judgment saw themselves as God saw them. Their sins rose up in all their vileness till shame and grief and self-loathing took complete possession. Pride was driven out, the face of man forgotten. Looking up to heaven, to Jesus whom they had betrayed, they smote themselves and cried out with bitter wailing: "Lord, Lord, cast me not away forever."

Everything else was forgotten; nothing else mattered; the scorn of men, the penalty of the law, even death itself seemed of small consequence if only God forgave. Men may have their theories of the desirability or undesirability of public confession of sin; but when the Spirit of God falls on guilty souls there will be confession, and no power on earth can stop it.*

CHAPTER XXV

Chansung's Confession

CHANSUNG had understood from the first what the leaders sought and had joined earnestly in the special prayer meetings. He was glad when those who had been guilty of hatred were given grace to confess and forgive; but when men began to confess other sins, some sins hidden back in their past lives, he was greatly troubled. What of his own great sin? Must he confess that? All these other sins over which men wept seemed as nothing to him in comparison with his own sin. How could he stand up and confess himself a murderer before all men? And the law—what of that?

All Monday night, during the great storms of confession which swept the church, Chansung remained with bowed head, weeping with the rest in silence. When the meeting was over he fled to his room; not to sleep, but to live over all night long his terrible crime. Now for the first time he saw what a sinner he was, not only against man, but against God. And he had added this to his great guilt, that he only shed human blood, but had deceived h ren and with blood-stained hands had dared in the sacred place and preach to others.

He had no question now as to his duty to to the church; yet how could he? How coul these people who believed in him that he h dered his young wife years ago and had been fugitive from justice under a false name ever

And worse still, what shame would he bri father! for Chansung knew that his father living. Though he had not dared to go n Pyeng Dong himself, he had made inquiry learned since coming to Pyeng Yang that hi still lived. Doubtless if he confessed he w arrested and convicted and probably put to But death seemed easy to bear compared public exposure and shame to himself and to hi

Thus burdened in spirit, he went to churc on Tuesday night. The meeting was even m matic than on Monday evening; and the w repentance and sorrow for sin that swept ag again over the great audience for fully six h broke over his tortured heart. Consumed wi he sat like one condemned to death, and at rose wearily to go home and continue the through another night.

This time, however, he did not struggle Many had marked his downcast face, and gues need of help had commenced praying for him.

Again another night Chansung fought his and all through the hours of the next day; bu no relief. The class had closed with the T night meeting. Wednesday night the congreg the Central Church, men and women, met; i the regular prayer-meeting evening.

The Church was again crowded, and the sam of repentance and sorrow for sin was manifest. Na led the service and spoke briefly but to th and with power:

The afternoon I was there the in charge sent in four different groups, one he other, and we sang, played and talked to all fferent crowds. at did we do for them in these meetings? First , usually we would sing some of the popular of the day that everybody could join in. One favorites was "The Long, Long Trail." This is o sing and has great harmonic possibilities in it, boys liked to sing it. They would sing the al words, then usually they wanted to sing the y:

There's à long, long trail a-winding
  Into No-Man's Land in France,
Where the shrapnel shells are bursting,
  But we must advance.
There'll be lots of drill and hiking
  Before our dreams all come true,
But we're going to show the Kaiser

any of the popular songs of the day that were ar during the period before the boys went over could sing: "Pack Up Your Troubles in Your Kit Bag and Smile" was one of their favorites; er was "Smiles"; after we taught them "The Long Mile" they liked that very much, too; Lauder's song, "Laddies Who Fought and ' was not very familiar, but they liked it after learned the chorus. My own song "We'll Be ng Till You Come Back Home" was liked by the because it was a direct message from the folks me to the boys over there.

o not believe one man or woman in the United s would guess the title of the song that was asked for most. It is the last song I would pick o sing for a crowd of big, rugged, husky soldiers. n't even take a copy of it with me, because as I it over neither the words nor the music appealed e, and I thought they would be very inappro- to sing to the soldiers. However, in y every crowd where I gave them a chance to out the song they wanted to sing, some fellow l call for "A Baby's Prayer at Twilight." This ong about how a little baby "goes up stairs to er prayers, asking God to bless her papa 'over .'" ptain Rock, one of the bright young men of ago in charge of a company of soldiers that went the top the day I was in the Argonne Forest, said e, "Mr. Rodeheaver, it is not unusual at all in renches when the men are waiting to go over the top to see them with their Bibles in their hands reading. It is not unusual to see and hear them pray in the trenches." Sometimes this is hard to understand because of the rough exterior they seem to have put on with their uniforms. To illustrate what I mean, one man said to a soldier, "Do you fellows ever pray when you go over the top?" The soldier replied: "Yes, we all pray then."

EN, too, they liked to sing some of the old hymns and some of the newer Gospel songs. A cular favorite among this class of songs was ghten the Corner Where You Are."

Dr. Bush, one of the splendid preachers who was over with the Y. M. C. A, was presenting to the men the organization of "Comrades in Service." This is an organization of mutual benefit to help men in the Christian life and in Bible study. After he had explained it to one crowd of husky soldier boys, he said, "Now, do you fellows think you really want this; would you be interested in it; do you really think it is a good thing for this crowd of men?" One brusque fellow spoke up and said: "Of course we want it. That's the kind of thing we need over here, but why didn't you bring it six months ago? We are ready to go home now."

Mr. Taylor and I conducted a meeting one night in the Y. M. C. A. hut in Fleury. This is a great railroad head for one of the sections of road operated by American railroad men. They allowed us to sleep in a little room just by the big dining-room where the officers took their meals—there was just a thin board partition between. In the early morning the Major came in with the Captain for breakfast. The Major was a great big, good-natured, hard, competent railroad man—had been superintendent of a division here in the United States. As he came into the dining-room we heard him say in a loud voice to the Captain, "Say, Captain, you know I mighty near got religion last night." The Captain said: "How is that, Major?" He replied, "Well, you see, this fellow Rodeheaver was over here playing that trombone, and singing in that hut, and he just put it up in such shape that I near got it myself."

There is that "something" in the heart and the life and the training of the American soldier boy that doesn't exist anywhere else. Here is a verse of a song—possibly you can understand what there is about it that caused the boys to take off their hats. No matter where it was, in the old shell-torn burrs, or out in the woods, even though it was raining, when I started to sing this song, off came their hats:

"Tell me the story of Jesus, write on my heart every word,
  Tell me the story most precious, sweetest that ever was heard.
  Tell how the angels in chorus sang as they welcomed His birth, Glory to God in the highest, peace and good tidings to earth.
  Tell me the story of Jesus, write on my heart every word,

ONE Sunday afternoon, under the trees, beneath the bright blue sky of France, all the time we could hear the heavy, dull roar and throbbing of the guns in the distance as they were biting out the lives of men. We played and sang. After we sang to the crowd of men, I asked General Upton if he did not want to say something to them. He got up on the steps of the cook cart beside me. I consider it one of the honors of my life to have stood beside this great soldier and heard the appeal he made to these men. We started the second meeting about four o'clock. He told them that at six o'clock they would start for the front line where their brigade, the 57th, would leap-frog the 58th and go into the front line trenches. He told them what he expected of them; how proud he was, and expected to be, of the record they had made and would make. He gave them some practical advice and simple instructions about what they could do, and what they could expect when they met the enemy. Then he made one of the strongest appeals I have ever heard. I believe it is the greatest international temperance lecture ever known. He said:

"Men, whatever you do, don't drink booze of any kind here in France. You cannot be at your best, physically or mentally, if you do it. What would you think of a carpenter if, before he started to work, he rubbed the edge of his tools on the edge of a stone and dulled them? You would think he was a fool. He is no more a fool than the man who has a great, important work to do, who will dull his tools by taking into his system booze, that will impair his efficiency, mentally and physically. I want you at your best when you meet these Germans tonight and tomorrow—you cannot be at your best if you drink. Just yesterday I relieved a Major and sent him to the rear because I found he had been drinking. I sent for him to give him some orders; he did not come promptly; when he did come I found he had been drinking, and without any question whatever I sent him immediately to the rear. I will not trust you men in the hands of any man who cannot control himself. $5,000 is the lowest possible price for dámages a railroad company would pay for a man that was killed. At this rate, this Major was in command of over $5,000,000 worth of men. From that standpoint alone I would not allow him to command you men, when he could not command himself—to say nothing of the greater value I put upon the lives of you men."

Then General Upton told how, on that memo able night when the Germans were about to come into Paris, he marched a crowd of sober American boys through the shattered army that was already retreating, and it was this crowd of sober American boys that stopped the Germans that night, saved Paris, and turned the tide of the battle!

That Sunday afternoon, as I looked into the faces of these six thousand men, I knew as I stood there and spoke to them, and as I sang to them, that I was singing the last song some of them would ever hear. They were going into the very front line, into the thickest part of the battle—we could know that some of those men would never see us again, would never see the sun go down. Had you been in my place, what would you have presented to these men? After we sang some of the hymns, I took out my little Testament and read to them the Message to the Soldiers from General Pershing, which I have pasted in the front of it. With a message like this from the Commander-in-Chief of the American Armies, I did not need to hesitate about presenting that same Saviour of whom General Pershing spoke, to this crowd of boys, and there amidst these unusual conditions of war, I said, "Every one of you men who wants to accept this same Christ as your Saviour, or wants to here and now renew your allegiance to Him, pledging anew your life for service and promising if He will give you His strength and power, you will live for Him and serve Him to the best of your ability; if you want to accept this proposition and here and now make anew your public reconsecration to your God, hold up your hand so all the fellows may know the intention of your heart and this reconsecration of

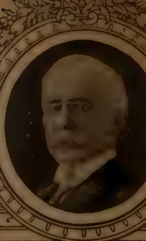
QUENCHING THE THIRST



A SERMON

By

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Rev. 22 : 17. "Let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

AND this is the feast: "The water of life." And these are the purposed guests at the feast: "He that is athirst"; "whosoever will." And these are the King's messengers, to give invitations to the feast: "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And he that heareth, let him say, Come." And this is the condition of entrance to the feast: "freely!" "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

When we are roaming through the Bible, we are never far away from the sound of waters. We have not gone far before we discover "a fountain of water in the desert"; there are wells on every hand; water gushes forth out of the rock of flint. Away in the Psalms there is "a river which maketh glad the city of God"; we sit down in the shadow of trees which are planted by the flowing streams. In Isaiah there are "wells of salvation"; rivers breaking out in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; the wilderness becomes a pool and the dry land springs of water. And so on by the "great waters" of Ezekiel, and the clear, strong mountain streams of Amos. On by the well of "living water" in John, to the sunlit fountains of the Apocalypse.

Yes, the sound of the Book is as "the sound of many waters," and we are never beyond the reach of their voice. And so everywhere there is a promise of refreshment, of satisfaction, the offer of sweet, plentiful waters to allay the thirst of man.

NOW I suppose there is no animal craving so fierce and so intolerable as the craving of thirst. I suppose this may be due to the fact that the deprivation of liquid is a condition with which all the tissues sympathize. Every atom of the body joins in the cry, and the expression is concentrated in the parched mouth and the dry and feverish lips. And this great craving of thirst is used in this book to symbolize the craving of the soul, and these plenteous waters are used to shadow forth the abundance of the satisfaction which is found in the Lord Jesus Christ.

"He that is athirst." There is need that we only open our eyes in order to see signs of human thirst; on every hand there is obtrusive evidence of our unsatisfied cravings. Look around you; better still, look within you; everywhere there are tokens of the absence of holy and radiant contentment. We are the victims of a pitiless vagrancy; we rush about in feverish restlessness, driven by an eager craving, as though we were in quest of waters which we had not yet found.

Where is that sunny satisfaction which endows life with its finest susceptibilities, which illuminates the home, and which constitutes the rarest solvent of those hard antipathies which freeze and bind our social life? That is not a question which disparages laudable ambition. There is progress which is not unfriendly to quietude. There is aspiration which can coexist with peaceful radiance of spirit. I speak, therefore, not to condemn ambition; that would be folly of a presumptuous kind; but I assert that the finest ambitions are best served by satisfied hearts, in lives where the profoundest cravings have been appeased.

NOW there are certain expedients to which men are continually resorting in the hope that the thirst may be allayed, but which unfailing experience has proved can never bring satisfaction. Sin cannot allay thirst. The wonderful thing is that we can ever persuade ourselves that it can. The devil can mix the most insidious potions, and can make them sparkle like the water of life, but when we drink them it is as though a man consumes salt water to appease his thirst. Animal gratification can never quench a spiritual craving.

It is the most pathetic of all tragedies when a man or a woman flees to drink to quiet the soul. It shall be "as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold, he drinketh; but he awaketh, and behold, he is faint, and his soul hath appetite."

And work cannot allay the thirst. I will join any man in singing a pæan of blessedness on work; but if hard work will lead to spiritual contentment the great majority of my congregation would be in the enjoyment of spiritual rest. And yet, after the hardest day's work, often in the midst of it, there is a sigh, a weariness, a sense of staleness, a certain out-of-jointness, which is abundant proof that the old craving is still there like a smoking volcano, and that its inner fires are not yet quenched. Thank God for work; but work can never take the place of God!

And money cannot allay the thirst. The most awful weariness in the world today will be found where money abounds. The fact of the matter is, spiritual satisfaction is to be obtained at a counter where money is not accepted as a means of exchange. "Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God can be purchased with money."

AND honor cannot allay thirst. Nor can satisfaction be found in the higher and finer cultures of the mind, in music and art and literature. These ministries can soothe, they can excite, they can gratify, but they cannot satisfy; and when the volume is closed, when the harmonious strains have died away, when the creations of art have been laid aside, the secret yearning asserts itself, and the unsatisfied soul cries out, "I thirst!"

And so it is that multitudes of people are very weary, and life is to them very flat and stale and profitless. They rush here and there and make no discoveries; they go for their holidays but find no rest; they awake but taste no ecstasy;
they lie down to sleep but they find n

I AM THINE

By MARY Q. INGRAM

I AM thine, O blessed Saviour;
Make my life and my behavior
More like thine.
Fill my soul with love o'erflowing;
Let the light divinely glowing Brighter shine.

I am thine, in thee abiding;
In the rock I still am hiding,
Day by day;
Keep me from all foes surrounding
And the powers of sin abounding
On life's way.

I am thine, O Lord, forever,
And no earthly power can sever
Me from thee;
Lead me on till life is riven,
That the beauties of yon heaven
I may see.

A Girl in Distress

E papers report a young lady in New York City in great distress. is not a physical invalid nor mental tive; she is not a slave pining away in a sweatshop; she is a young lady of wealth and culture who is unable to live on the fifteen thousand dollars a year which her father provided for her in his will. In her distress she has made application to the surrogate to allow her five thousand dollars more yearly. Her application for increase has been made by her mother, who is her guardian. The mother is compelled to file a schedule of expenditures for the year, which shows how the poor girl is pinched with her small income, and the necessity for the other five thousand. From the court records there is this quotation: "Maintenance of two automobiles, $5,000; clothing, $3,000; manicuring, shampooing and hair-dressing, $3,000; education and contributions to churches, $2,000; pleasure, including traveling, hotel bills, dinners, dances and theater parties, $3,000; physicians, opticians, dentists, drugs and medicine, $1,600." The girl is foolish and the mother is more to blame, for teaching such bad notions of life. The silly extravagance of the rich makes a poor type of womanhood, sets a miserable example to society and does very much to provoke the red flag of dynamite and anarchy. The girl in the office, shop, store or other place of employment who earns her living or helps support her widowed mother or invalid father, or educates her brother or sister, is a far better specimen of womanhood and a better hope for the republic than the extravagance of the idle rich. Not all the children of the rich are idle or extravagant. Many of them are industrious and saving and generous with the poor, setting good examples to the community, blessing their fellow men. They obey this injunction: "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches; . . . that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute; . . . laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come." (I Tim. 6 : 17-19.)

Blockade of Germany Raised

WITH the lifting of the economic blockade of Germany on July 12 by the Council of Five in Paris, the United States immediately undertook to resume trade with her former enemy. For the first time in five years ships were loaded in American ports for Germany. The Shipping Board is opening up direct steamship lines to Hamburg from New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore and South Atlantic and Gulf ports. The importation of necessities such as food, footwear and clothing will be made quite freely, but the cabinet intends to admit luxuries and raw materials only to the extent that is thought advantageous from the economic viewpoint.

This is a happy start to let the millions of Germany and Europe go to work and earn a living for their families and money to lift the national debt. The ships can not go too swiftly with food for the hungry in Germany and among the Allies. The Red Cross people are busy packing up and sending supplies to the suffering ones. What a pity our government let so much food in France spoil that could have been sold or given to the hungry! This supply of the necessities of life will do much to cure the anarchy of Europe. A contentment bred of the fruit of industry is a strong safeguard for a nation. "Having food and raiment, let us be content." (I Tim. 6 : 8.)

Criticized King Playing Golf

THE Amir of Afghanistan was so fond of golf that he spent most of his time at that sport, much to the dissatisfaction of his ministers and people, his sons and intimate friends, who could not understand his enjoyment of the "foreign" game. He died recently, and was buried under the links · whether to consecrate the "foreign" game or as a warning to others it was not stated. It seems that the people did not so much object to the fact that the ruler took exercise, as that he did so in a foreign game and transferred to his country the customs of foreign nations. From the earliest time this national exclusiveness has been manifested. The Greeks counted themselves civilized, all the rest barbarians. For thousands of years the exclusiveness of the nations of the Far East has been imperative; in fact, a number of the greatest nations have had laws putting to death foreigners found within their borders. The most complete exclusiveness was required of the Hebrew nation for the preservation of its theocracy. When Christ came to establish his kingdom the spirit of exclusiveness in the new members was deep-seated, but the wall was broken down by the vision of Peter and by the missionary labors of St. Paul. When the universal brotherhood of the race was preached and established to the company gathered at the house of Cornelius, Peter said: "Ye know how that it is an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company, or come unto one of another nation; but God hath shewed me that I should not call any man common or unclean." (Acts 10:28.)

Bastile Day

OF all the fête days of holiday-loving France the one on July 14, Bastile Day, is perhaps the greatest, celebrating as it does, the delivery of France from the dominion of despotism. France and her Allies on July 14 this year joined in celebrating the liberation of the nations of the world from the oppression of monarchy. It is estimated that at least 2,000,000 visitors from the provinces and cities of France thronged Paris. Tens of thousands of people took their places so that they could see the procession as early as three o'clock Sunday afternoon and remained all night to be certain of their places the next day. General Joffre led the generals in the procession, General Foch came next, and then Pershing, and the brave men they had led. Sifted in among the familiar khaki and blue and green were fighters in picturesque costumes from many parts of the world. Sheiks from the desert were there, Mohammedans in fezes, East Indians in their turbans, Algerians, Senegalese; all sorts and conditions of men from nearly all corners of the world were in that line. Of course our American boys were hailed with the highest enthusiasm as the saviors of France and of the world in the contest. President Wilson sent this message to President Poincaré of France on the occasion of the celebration of Bastile Day: "May I not on this day, which commemorates the breaking of the chain that once bound France to an intolerable servitude, convey to the people of France the cordial fraternal greetings of the people of the United States and their sense of privilege and joy in having been associated with France in breaking the bonds of the world?" Events move so swiftly that we do not realize how many centuries we have advanced in the cause of human freedom in the last year. On July 14, 1918, the cause of the Allies was in peril and the freedom of the world unsettled. God gave the victory to the right and liberty to his dear children, the common people of the world. Let it not be forgotten that God is the author of our victories and Jesus Christ the real sovereign of the world. It is his spirit of truth, justice and love that is the one guarantee of happiness to the individual or the nation. The result of the World War has largely promoted the establishment of Christ's Kingdom in the world, which means universal peace, liberty and love. This mighty truth is thus expressed by Christ himself: "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." (John 8 : 36.)

Million to Help Prisoners

THE Prisoners' Relief Society has been favorably known to the members of the Christian Herald Family as a worthy cause for the last five years. It is now facing an unusual opportunity to make its work effective throughout the nation. A man of wealth who is interested in the work has offered $200,000 providing the society is able to raise $800,000. From the beginning the Prisoners' Relief Society has been handicapped for lack of funds, but it has done remarkable work considering the amount of money at its disposal. The fund of $1,000,000 will place the society in a position to plan a regular budget and to organize branch offices in the principal cities of the country, through which it can serve more quickly the men released from prison in the various districts. We know of no more worthy cause than this of making possible to the man once accused of crime an opportunity to live again as an honest man. It helps the man, and every man who is reclaimed relieves society both of the danger of crime and of the expense and support of a criminal.

God's Hand in the Outcome

MANY sermons have been preached and not a few books written in which reverent recognition is given to divine direction in the great war. Repeatedly the Christian Herald has been asked by readers whether there had been any act on the part of the Peace Conference, either in prayer or address, which would show to the nations that the august body leaned upon God for wisdom and direction. That the leaders in the Conference, President Wilson included, have deeply felt the need of this amid their difficult problems, we feel justified in believing. All the leaders are men of strong religious convictions.

In the President's address to the United States Senate on July 10, when he presented the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations, there is one memorable passage in which he spoke not for himself alone, but for his associates in the Conference:

"The stage is set, the destiny disclosed. It has come about by no plan of our conceiving, but by the hand of God, who led us into this way. . . . It was of this that we dreamed at our birth."

God's ways are not as our ways. In the darkest days, when clouds of trouble veil the sun, when plans seem doomed to hopeless failure and when hearts are torn with suffering and anxiety, then we are conscious of the grace that lifts us up toward the Cross. In their sacrifices and sufferings human hearts are touched and lifted upwards. An invisible hand draws them to heights from which they can have the larger view and the fuller realization of the divine purpose.

This was finely expressed in a recent discourse by Rev. J. B. Stambaugh, of Marlboro, Mass. The ascent upward may be one of suffering all the way, and it is only by facing it bravely that the summit is reached. Yet no traveler, standing even on the highest Himalayan peak, ever gazed upon so wide a horizon of world sin and world suffering as that which Jesus saw from the summit of Golgotha. It was when so lifted up that he could draw all men unto him, and his followers, through sacrifice for his sake, are given strength to overcome all obstacles that hinder the souls of men from turning to God.

He had led us, as a nation, up to the Mount of Higher Vision and wider opportunities. Let us strive to know his will and to do it with abundant courage and confidence.

Better Days Coming in Korea

THERE are indications that better days are in store for the oppressed people of Korea. In response to protests and appeals from the Federal Council of Churches and other organizations, a message has been received from the Japanese Premier, Takashi Hara, in which he states that a comprehensive plan of administrative reform in Korea is now under consideration and will be carried into effect as soon as possible. He and his associates in the Cabinet have a "fixed determination" to promote the welfare of their Korean kinsmen, and to insure "a distinct betterment of conditions in that country."

The Japanese government now knows just how the American nation, with which it has long enjoyed friendly relations, regards the recent disturbances in Korea. Detailed reports of the atrocities, covering a period of many months, have been transmitted by the Federal Council to the Premier, accompanied by a message urging that the projected administrative reforms should include putting an end to brutality, torture, religious persecution and massacres in Korea, and pointing out that existing conditions endangered international goodwill.

Japan's sense of national self-respect, and let us hope her conscience also, has been touched by the appeals in behalf of the people of Korea. There are indications that those outbreaks against a defenseless population are now beginning to be regarded by high Japanese officials as unworthy of a great nation and a disgrace to the Mikado's empire. We believe this view of the case will spread, and that the self-respecting and influential element will ultimately unite in the demand that the blot upon the fame of Japan be quickly effaced.

The Fight for Prohibition

NO ONE who has had a part in the fight for prohibition regarded the battle as ended by the ratification of the Amendment to the Federal Constitution. That was a great victory. It took the stronghold; but the Wet army, though suffering defeat, was far from whipped.

The Wets have planned to get around the Amendment in two ways: either they would leave the definition of intoxicants to the courts, assuring confusion worse confounded through conflicting decisions in various jurisdictions, or, under the provision for concurrent state enforcement, they would leave the definition to the States. By a series of well-advertised experiments, they hit on 2¾ per cent. as a measure of alcohol, too little to befuddle but sufficient to please, and they have been making a country-wide campaign to create apparent sentiment in favor of this magic formula, only one-half of one per cent. below the strength of former light beers.

A good many declarations of the gathering strength of the Wet sentiment have been current of late, all aimed at Congress and designed to soften the blow in the enforcement act under debate in the House. On July 14 the House began its debate and 2¾ per cent. beer was killed by a vote of 157 to 90. In spite of every known tactic of delay, the Wets lost consistently and completely. The definition of an intoxicant liquor having one-half of one per cent. alcohol by weight remained in the bill. That measures the intent of the Congress as to what it means to prohibit. Whether or not a beverage with more than one-half of one per cent. alcohol will affect the stability of either mind or matter will not be left open to discussion. For the purpose of this particular case, in order to avoid all conflicts between chemistry, sophistry, and judicial wisdom, the fatal percentage will be fixed and an enforceable law will result.

The country is through with booze of every degree, though the battle still goes on, and the final surrender of the cohorts of John Barleycorn is not yet fixed on the calendar. But some day the Wets will discover that their cause has evaporated and that the desert of prohibition is blossoming with the rose of an unprecedented and clear-headed prosperity.

Idealism Under Fire

UNDER the grilling of the lawyers, Henry Ford has had a rather rough experience. He has been made to appear illogical and to say many things which, to those who know him, must appear absurd. Idealism has little chance of recognition on the witness stand. It is not surprising that, to avoid confusion and shut off further controversy, Mr. Ford admitted that he was "an ignorant idealist." In making that concession he really scored a triumph, for everybody knows the character of his idealism—his great desire to be helpful to his fellow men and to lift them out of poverty and industrial slavery; his wholehearted generosity to his employees and his marvelous success in bringing happiness and prosperity to thousands of homes. His idealism is of a kind that shines all the brighter when it is attacked. He may know little about war and less about history, and he may be weak at definitions and a perfect tyro in politics and journalism; but he is a citizen who can think for himself and others, and whose record of helpfulness might be envied by many who have had large opportunities for service along idealistic lines but who did not have the vision. The country would be glad to have many more idealists of the Ford type. It is a gift which culture may develop; although it cannot confer it.

Where Will Wilhelm Be Tried?

ALMOST any court may try a commoner, but to bring a Kaiser to the bar is a harder proposition. England, which only lately was excited over the proposition to try the Kaiser in London, has taken second thought and is now in a calmer judicial mood. It has occurred to some of the more clear-headed statesmen that to bring Wilhelm to the bar in the midst of his enemies would not wholly conform to the British spirit of fair play, and that a trial conducted under such auspices might give the impression of national hostility and vindictiveness.

Just when and where he will ultimately be arraigned is still left indefinite. It may be that the duty will fall to an international court assembled at Versailles or Paris. Geneva, while ideal in other respects, would provide an atmosphere distinctly favorable to Germany, and there are apprehensions that the Swiss might be disposed to hold the scales of justice too accommodatingly. The Peace Palace at The Hague has been suggested as a logical possibility, having the advantage of being on neutral soil. It has been intimated that the ex-Kaiser himself has hopes that he might be summoned to face his ordeal in a German court; but it is scarcely conceivable that justice would be wholly uninfluenced amid surroundings where only a few years ago he was univer shiped as "All Highest," and where his Junk

Pulling vs Carrying

r the farmer whose volume of product does not ant the purchase of a motor truck, but who owns ssenger car, the small trailer furnishes an ideal ion of his transportation difficulties. An invest- t of approximately one hundred and twenty-five rs will provide him with the means to haul his uce to market or railroad and return with such lies as he must from time to time purchase in but whose transport has heretofore presented ulties. Hitches for the trailer are provided which be attached to any make of automobile or motor k in but a few moments by one possessed of little o mechanical ability.

ndy or muddy roads offer but little difficulty to ruck or passenger car and trailer; the weight being ibuted over a greater number of wheels, less tive effort is required and miring need not be a ter for apprehension. If the roads are so soft as e absolutely impassable the loss in investment and ugh depreciation to the trailer owner is a fraction of what it would be did he e a heavy expensive motor truck standidle.

he scope of activity of the trailer is by neans limited to the farm. Many rural l routes have been equipped with them the government, with a consequent ex- iting of deliveries and collections, the is being doubled with but a slight in- se in cost. Bus lines between cities and lying communities through adopting vehicle have increased their carrying lities, thereby providing their patrons h better service but yielding a larger fit to the owners as well.

Many large construction companies maintain full trains of trailers carrying material and supplies to the scene of operations; cities find them valuable in many ways; highway commissions, engineering firms—there is hardly any industry or business in which the trailer cannot be used to advantage. To the farmer, though, it should prove most attractive. Its low initial cost, low maintenance and running expenses, slight depreciation and general utility render it especially suitable for use on the farm of any size, from the smallest to the largest.

The use of a trailer prevents overloading, a common and costly practice which results in huge repair bills, abnormal depreciation and loss of time and service.

Trailers may be divided into two distinct types: first the reversible, which can be drawn or steered from either end, thereby obviating the necessity of uncoupling and backing by hand power, which must be done in the case of the second or non-reversible type. The chief factor in favor of the non-reversible vehicle is in its cheapness.

There are trailers of all sizes, from the small two-wheeled type of three-quarter ton capacity which the farmer may attach to his touring car and bowl merrily along at a thirty-mile speed, to the huge twenty-ton vehicle designed for the government and used to transport small tanks to the firing line in France.

The three-quarter and one ton type is especially popular. Attached to a touring car it hauls more than a team can, three trips may be made instead of one, the farm's produce hauled to market and on the return supplies brought to the farm. A special home-made rack may be attached and cattle carried to market, or the ordinary farm wagon body may be installed on the chassis.

In the purchase of a single motor truck there must be considered the heaviest weight and the greatest volume which would be hauled during the harvest season; the single truck must be large enough to handle this load. During most of the year the owner could probably operate satisfactorily with a truck of but half the size needed during his busy season; he must, however, pay the higher cost of fuel, maintenance and depreciation on the large truck. Half his carrying capacity is wasted half the time or more and with no appreciable return. The remedy for this is to buy a truck for the average loads and add a trailer for the large. By the purchase of a truck capable of hauling but half his maximum load the farmer can operate at full efficiency throughout the year. When the work is light the truck can be used alone; when the work increases, a trailer bought at one-quarter the cost of a truck of similar capacity will take care of the additional load at about fifteen per cent. of the operating cost of the truck.

The farm owner who does his hauling with teams, but who owns a passenger car, can by the purchase of a trailer relieve his horses for necessary farm work or reduce the number in his stable. Every horse saved means five more acres for profit production.

For the producer of large crops, the dairyman operating on an extensive scale, the cattle raiser who must drive his animals many miles to the loading point with the attendant loss in weight which inevitably results, the large four-wheeled type of trailer is preferable. Ofttimes it is found to be of advantage to run these vehicles in trains. The ordinary motor truck will pull three or four loaded trailers without difficulty and frequently there are seen trains of eight or ten, all heavily laden and drawn along the highway at a three or four mile per hour speed by a tractor.

As much skilled expert workmanship enters into the construction of a trailer as into the motor truck itself. A farm wagon attached to the rear of a motor vehicle does not become thereby a trailer. The wheels, bearings, axles and springs of a wagon were never designed to withstand high speeds and the wagon so used would be but short lived.

The use of a trailer with a motor truck or passenger car increases gasoline consumption about ten per cent.; this additional expenditure is far below the cost of an additional truck or one of twice the size to carry the same load. With a light truck and trailer the same load may be transported at a much greater speed than with a heavy slower truck.

Road speed is an important factor in reducing costs and no less important is it to the farmer to deliver his produce in the best possible condition. To the dairyman and truck gardener this element of speed is an especially important consideration and one which vitally affects his income.

The farmer whose business is large enough to keep a truck and trailer on the road continually will find it to be of advantage to cut his loading and labor costs by the maintenance of two trailers, one being at the loading point receiving its contents while the other is on the road to the distributing point or railway station. Time lost while a single truck and trailer were on the road can thus be utilized with an appreciable saving in money.

Keeping at One's Best

SUNDAY. Ps. 25:5. "On thee do I wait all the day." What I am thinking about is this—that so many of us only wait on God for a very little while, and then we withdraw, and it is all over. Our waiting is a passing visit, it is not an abiding. We merely call upon the Lord, we do not live with him. We go and we come away, we do not wait on him all the day.

The trouble with many of us is found in this broken and fragmentary idea of the devotional life. We think of our devotions as a sort of discipline of gymnastics which we can pack into five or ten minutes. We do not regard them as a vital communion which runs right through the day. And so fellowship comes to be looked upon as a kind of morning drill. Not that I would disparage the morning drill, even in physical exercises; but the morning drill is not worth much if it is followed by the careless indifference of a lounging attitude, or a shambling walk, or if we huddle up in our chairs in an almost hunchbacked deformity. And the morning devotion is worth just as little if it is regarded as something we can do and have done with and carry no shaping devoutness into the rest of the day. We have not really entered into the secret place of the Most High if we can leave it behind. The only vital fellowship is that which waits on God "all the day."

Professor Gairdner used to say, "One never knows what work God may ask one to do at any moment, and one should always be at one's best." And surely that is only a paraphrase of the Master's counsel: "Have your loins girt and your lamps trimmed, and be ye ready." And if this spiritual readiness is to be ours, it will demand a spiritual habit and not merely an occasional act. For it implies a way of living. It means that the soul keeps itself reverently posed toward the Eternal with an alert readiness to know and to do the will of the Lord.

That is one of the shining distinctions of the angels of God: "They do his commandments harkening unto the voice of his word." Their spirit is ever ready, they are alert and vigilant. They serve him day and night in his temple, and it is a service in which they never tire and never grow old.

Beauty for Ashes

MONDAY. Isa. 61:1, 3. "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to . . . give unto them beauty for ashes." These are very sacred words. They were the first text from which Jesus ever preached a public discourse. When he stood up in the synagogue at Nazareth on the Sabbath Day he opened the Scriptures at this chapter and began to read, and said, "Today is this Scripture fulfilled."

Ashes are the Biblical symbol of human frailty, deep humiliation and sorrow, and absence of nourishment and satisfaction. The Bible takes a very realistic view of the world. It sees the world as it ought to be, and it sees the world as it is. It sees the ruin wrought by selfishness and sin, and holds up before us the picture of a transfigured world. How is this transfiguration to be accomplished? By the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It is to be God's agency in the transformation of the wilderness, in the conversion of chaos and waste into order and beauty. Three things Jesus Christ does for us which fulfill the promise of this verse. He takes away our unrest and gives us inward satisfaction. He bestows grace to enable us to endure sorrow without complaint. He gives us a comforting sense of superiority to death. All these things are by way of fulfilling the figure of the prophet, "beauty for ashes."

Sin is destructive. It is like fire. Unchecked, it leaves only waste and ruin in its train. But have we not seen in the wake of a forest fire a rich growth of flowers of brilliant colors? Nature believes in conversion. Why should not we? Recovery of health after sickness is in the realm of the physical a type of spiritual recovery, a seal and pledge of abundant pardon, of restoration through grace that is in Christ. He giveth beauty for ashes.

Spiritual Heliographs

TUESDAY. Matt. 5:14. "Ye are the light of the world." As the moon and planets are perfect reflectors of the light of the sun, so the Christian is the transmitter of the light divine, the illuminator of social life, business life and the religious life of men. We are more than reflectors—we are the light as it is in Jesus, shining in his world that men may be led to glorify your Father which is in heaven.

If we cannot become a great lighthouse, flashing its beams far out on the ocean of life, we can truly shine like a candle to single individuals along the shore. "You in your little corner and I in mine." Some Christians, like the moon, only occasionally are luminous with the full front; they have spells of shining. Not like John the Baptist, who was a bright and shining light every moment of his life. When a lighthouse fails, boats are dashed on the rocks and wrecks float along the shore. When the Christian fails to trim his lamp by prayer, and keep it full of the oil of grace, how great and terrible is the darkness for perishing mortals who are feeling after God. Christians are miniature Christs to men.

Centuries ago, in London, it was the custom for the crier on the streets to say, "Hang out your light." So Christ says to all his followers, "Put not your light under a bushel," but let it flame forth, for light means life, warmth, beauty, growth, happiness, and heaven.

Be apostles of sunshine, help scatter away the darkness, ushering in the morning of beauty and victory. Night means trouble and sorrow; only the stars save the night from despair. Be children of the light, for fullness of joy comes with the Dayspring from on high.

The First Revival

WEDNESDAY. Acts 2:2. "A mighty rushing wind." A hurricane is, in strictly scientific terms, a movement of air to a vacuum where creatures need air to breathe. In that upper room sat men and women in whose beings there was a great capacity for God. Like the hart at the waterbrooks, they "panted" for him, and the Spirit, blowing where he listeth, filled, as it were, the lungs of their souls. Given the conditions, this amazing thing had to be. But the conditions, as we have seen, were perfected by humble preparation. In visiting them, the Spirit was not countenancing malice or cruelty or persecuting jealousy.

There remained nothing in them of the passion which might transform their own blessing into somebody else's evil. The gift which they received was formidable, momentous, even menacing. But they could be trusted—they had become trustworthy.

And I note this: The place where they met was shaken. When God thus enters the lives of men, circumstances do tremble. As in the world today, a mighty rushing wind sweeps away the landmarks. Only the flame itself stays steady—unflickering amid the tumult, a fiery pillar amid the hurricanes of the wilderness. It is a flame, kindling no longer on nations as nations, nor on priests as priests, nor on kings as kings. It illuminates the faces of your own sons and your daughters, your old men and your young men, and your very selves. It is not mere fancy nor emotion; there is no intellect too educated, no imagination too brilliant, for this divine and intimate enlightment. In very truth this Holy Spirit is, it seems to me, the one all-inclusive miracle or living wonder that we lack. To want him sincerely, to await him with patience, to receive him in grateful submission is the whole secret of the Life worth living.

The Forbidden Touch

THURSDAY. John 20:17. "Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father." The lesson that Jesus taught Mary of Magdala was a lesson for us. The old things of his earthly life had passed away. The work which he had come to do was finished; and at his ascension, every experience of his disciples was to be translated into the terms of spiritual life. No more would he lead them on weary itineraries in Galilee, but from his high place in heaven he would lead them to the conquest of the world! No more conversations by the wayside in the rude vernacular of men, but dreams and visions and voices in the watches of the night! No more frugal banquets in the upper room, but feasts of fat things and wine upon the lees in trysting places where the eyes of the soul are open to see the living God!

Oh, no; there is no interruption of our friendship due to the fact that we cannot touch him with fleshly hands or see him with these eyes. The new relation to which Jesus invited Mary in the words, "Touch me not," is a friendship far closer and more wonderful than Mary had ever dreamed of. Listen to Paul: "Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more." To know him after the spirit is to enter into a higher, larger and more intimate, because a divine, knowledge of him.

Personal Experience with hreaded Rubber Insulation

I have one of the original lot of Still Better Willards, put out in 1916 before any announcement had been made to the general public.

It was in February, 1919, that I discovered my battery had Threaded Rubber Insulation. The car had seen plenty of hard service. I drove it all through the hard winter of 1918—extreme cold and lots of dark days.

But I never had any battery trouble of any kind till one morning in February when I found the battery dead. The day before, the distributor was out of order and a friend of mine who was driving, punished the starter severely and exhausted the battery.

I went to the nearest Willard Service Station, got a rental battery, and had mine recharged. I was told what I didn't know—that I had Threaded Rubber Insulation in my Willard Battery.

I haven't had it recharged since, and it has the same old punch and pep today (June 1st). That's some record, I'll say.

A. JUDSON,
13740 Euclid Ave., Cleveland, Ohio.

The above is a fair sample of what Threaded Rubber insulation means. If this battery had had wood insulation, it would long since have had to be reinsulated; for the owner frankly admitted he had never been any too regular about keeping it filled with water.

Of course, starvation, overheating and improperly regulated electrical equipment will injure even a Willard Battery with Threaded Rubber Insulation, and therefore it's impossible to guarantee any definite length of life. But under equal conditions Threaded Rubber Insulation greatly extends a battery's life and indefinitely postpones reinsulation.

Three years' experience on thousands of cars has established this fact beyond any question.

die and is here tonight; here even by my side. This is she. Chunwha, speak. Go to him."

And Chunwha fell at his feet with a cry, how glad! "Chansung, my husband, don't you know me? It is I, Choonwha, your bride."

Then Chansung understood.

"God be praised; it is true!" and he drew her to him; and Elder Kang raised his hand in blessing and passed out, leaving them alone to a joy too great for other eyes to witness.

CHAPTER XXVI

Home Again

NEVER had road seemed shorter or the world more fair than the two days Chansung and Chunwha walked together from Pyeng Yang to Tai Pyeng Dong. Together they lived over the years of separation, marveling and praising God at the manifest providence that had guided their lives. What joy to be near each other, to drink in the loved tones of each other's voices, to look into each other's eyes and see the love-light there! Sometimes the joy of it could not be expressed in words and they broke forth in song, and again and again they knelt by the roadway and poured out their gratitude to God.

The Elder was much in their thought and prayers.

"If father will only believe now, my joy will be complete," said Chunwha.

"Can we doubt it?" Chansung answered. "When God has done so much for us, can we doubt that he will answer our prayers for father too?"

At last Tai Pyeng Dong lay before them. The river was still frozen, and they crossed on the ice. Avoiding the lower houses, they passed by a path unchanged from Chansung's boyhood days to his father's gate.

"Let me go in first," said Chunwha. "You wait outside until I call you."

She found the Elder alone in his study, and was frightened to see how old and weak he had grown.

"Choonwha, is it you?" he cried, unable to hide his joy in seeing her again.

"Yes, father, and I have come to stay—no," she hastened at the Elder's exclamation of surprise, "I have not given up being a Christian; but you are going to be a Christian with me. Wait till you have heard what I have come to tell you, and then answer."

Slipping to her knees, she took his hand.

"Father, I know how hard it has been; but God is good. Listen. When I came here once before and asked you to be a Christian, what did you say? 'Let God give me back my children and I will believe that he is good.' And, father, will you not keep your promise? If God gives you back your children today, will you become a Christian?"

At her words the Elder turned pale. Trembling in every limb, he answered, "Girl, be careful what you say. I cannot bear it."

Without waiting for further answer, Chunwha called Chansung.

"Father! Father!"

"My son! My son!"

And they were weeping in each other's arms.

When the strength of the brace had passed, Chansung sl his knees beside Chunwha. Ta hand in his he said:

"Father, behold your childr God has restored. I, too, am tian. Will you not believe now?"

Tears streamed from the Eld Placing a hand on each bowed surrendered:

"O Jesus, Son of God, I y proud heart to thee."

It was reported that the importation of wheat from Australia and South American countries was threatening to send the market below the Government guaranteed price of $2.26 a bushel.

Congress Recognizes Veto. The House, on July 17, recognized the justice of the President's veto by passing the Sundry Civil Bill with an increase in the appropriation for the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers, sailors and marines from $6,000,000, as originally proposed, to $14,000,000. The Senate passed the bill on the following day.

France Fights Living Cost. The French Government will attack the high cost of living through four plans: food selling booths, cheap restaurants, under the control of the Minister of Supplies, the marketing of all war stocks and foodstuffs through cooperative societies, and the curbing of illicit speculation in foodstuffs. That these plans are not moving fast enough to satisfy French opinion was evidenced on July 18 when the French Chamber by a vote of 227 to 213 passed a resolution calling the attention of the Governm the fact that since the armisti cost of living had decreased in B by one-half, in England by one-q and had increased in France.

I was about leaving the main ward in the hospital at Orleans, a doctor said: "Mr. Rodeheaver, that poor fellow down at the end of the row is in very bad shape; I am afraid he is not going to get well unless something can be done for him. He is wasting all the strength he needs to rebuild himself in worrying about what he is going to do when he gets home. I wish you would speak to him specially before you go away."

I walked up beside his cot and said, "Old fellow, how are you getting along today?" He was pale and thin and looked very blue and discouraged. His condition showed plainly as he looked up into my face and with a very plaintive note in his voice, said:

"Mr. Rodeheaver, I am in a mighty bad way. They have taken off one of my legs and now they say they will have to take the other one off. I do not see what in the world I am going to do when I get back home. I've got a wife and baby and an old mother out in Kansas, all depending on me for support and I don't see what in the world I am going to do. There is a little store out there —if I could get hold of it some way, I might be able to support them; but I can't do anything in this fix and I just don't see how I am going to be able to make it go."

I said, "Look up here at me, old man; take off that discouraged expression from your face and put a smile on there. Don't you know that you are a representative of the most generous nation on the face of the earth? If you are not in a position to do it when you get home, you won't have to do anything, because you are a representative of a Government that will take care of you." He smiled the slightest bit and said, "Do you really think they will do that?" I said, "Old man, I am so dead sure of t that I am willing to promise you right here and now that if they do not, I will." Then he started to grin. The doctor, who was standing beside us, said, "Now you certainly ought to be satisfied, Winan—you are sure to come through all right now; stop worrying and let us help you get well." We left him smiling. I was told later that he was getting better and would be coming home before long now.

Winning Others to Christ

International Sunday School Lesson for August 10

John 1 : 40-46; Luke 19 : 1-10; Acts 16 : 9-15; James 5 : 19, 20

The Joy of the Soul-Winner

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE last half of the glorious first chapter of John teems with the joy of finding Jesus, heightened by the added joy of bringing others to Jesus. Of course the outstanding event of a Christian life is its time of yielding full allegiance to the wondrous Master, whether by the transformation of a sudden conversion or the definite decision crowning long thought and service in preparation. But the developing experience of a disciple should have many another place of high intercourse with the Lord, many a soul-stirring season in the Spirit, among which the thrill of soul-winning has a special significance.

The great practical heresy of sincere church people is this—they delegate entirely to a few ordained and separated men the whole duty of evangelism. While preacher and evangelist have their place, and a great place it is, we can see clearly from the primitive records that Christianity is a layman's religion, and its early triumphs were largely due to the soul-winning zeal of the average believer. Every disciple should be a discipler; there is a universal priesthood of believers; all are intercessors; all are to be evangelists according to their opportunity. Our text from the Letter of James embodies a truth which seems to have been constantly before the first disciples.

Winning One's Own Household

Simon Peter "findeth first his own brother." When Lydia in our lesson story became Paul's first convert in Macedonia her whole household came with her into the Christian fold. When the nobleman of Capernaum received the blessing of Jesus in the healing of his child, we read, "himself believed and his whole house." So it was with the Philippian jailer. Thank God for the measure of the maintenance to our own time of this household religion, of whole families brought to Jesus by a consecrated father, or mother, or elder brother. So it goes today in the heathen lands afar. When one of a pagan family enters into the way of Christ he is indefatigable in his efforts to win those of his own house. Here in the homeland, where distinctions are less clearly drawn, many have overlooked and neglected this duty. It is astonishing to learn from time to time of a devout worshiper who never even dreams of trying so much as to bring a member of his family into the worship of the Church.

Probably this is a more normal experience, though a vivid one: A gentleman drove up to the parsonage of a rural church and asked for the minister. After hearty greetings he explained his errand. He had purchased a delightful property in the hills; for four months in the year his growing boys were enjoying vacation in the country. The family altar was maintained, but it grieved him that there was no church, both for the sake of his neighbors and his own sons. He offered to make a big sacrifice financially to establish a little mission field, which became thoroughly successful, its nucleus being this Christian man and his wife, the six lads and their playmates. Who shall say what part this incident played in the careers of these young men, now one a pastor, one a missionary, one a Christian physician, and the others Christian workers wherever they go.

In winning one's own household, as elsewhere, it is the life which counts, not the words only—the grace of the Lord Jesus in the heart as well as the "saying of grace" at meals, the manifestation of his forbearance and his spirit of unselfishness and service. Fidelity rather than argument wins. The humble, faithful follower is more apt to bring all the loved ones than the brilliant superficial speaker.

We must not judge one another in this regard. Neither must we be overwhelmed with sorrow of soul if we seem to fail, so long as we have been faithful. Remember that Jesus' own brothers did not believe on him.

The Enlarging Circle

Andrew, Peter, Philip, Nathanael—so the circle of disciples always grows. The friendship of Philip and Nathanael is a beautiful counterpart of the brotherliness of Andrew and Peter. There is an organized effort in Britain called the "Catch My Pal" Movement, which only makes very definite as an objective in Christian soul-winning what has always been a characteristic of Christianity from the time of Philip to now. In one of our churches is a Boy Scout who probably would misunderstand and resent being called a missionary or an evangelist, who has brought boy after boy to the Sunday school and has had more than that to do with their joining the church as well. Deep in his heart there is the old joy of soul-winning, however, as one after another is baptized.

Strangely enough we fail to invite and tactfully urge our neighbors and friends even to go with us to the house of God. We are missing blessing; the fields are white unto harvest, while Christians are curiously timid and indifferent about enlisting as laborers. The people are just as timid about making a step toward the Cross, and need to be not only invited but called for and accompanied to church and in other ways as well brought near unto Jesus.

Most singular of all is the neglect we ofttimes show regarding our fellow members of the class and even those who look up to us as teachers and officers. Every pastor knows how a certain teacher will bring her class one by one to decision while another goes on for years and never so much as thinks of becoming a soul-winner. The former type counts as a great factor in the Kingdom. Not long ago such a teacher died and left a wife overwhelmed with grief. The next day eight boys came to her home and insisted upon seeing her. They told her of the wonderful influence of her husband and insisted on walking beside the carriage which bore his body to the grave. Each promised that his life should be a monument to the fidelity of the beloved teacher who had shown him Christ in all his power and glory. No less than five of these boys became ministers of the gospel, while the other three are today Christian business men of great influence in that community. Talk about stars in one's crown!

We have to plan definitely and prayerfully a real campaign for a friend or a classmate. Read the selection from Luke in our lesson and see how definitely Jesus evidently set himself to win Zaccheus for the Kingdom of God.

Earnestness in Religion

The social radical, the religious faddist, are always zealous in winning proselytes for their dubious propagandas, while the majority of so-called Christians are absolutely passive. Is the lack one of earnestness of conviction? If we have a wonderful thing we are anxious to pass it on; if we have found a great cure for our sickness we eagerly recommend it to the fellow sufferer. Can it be that we have lost the joy of our salvation, the enthusiasm of the Great Commission? Then the only preparation for evangelism is a deepening of our own experience, a revaluation of our faith, a renewed acquaintance with him who spoke the words of life. Yes, we need conviction, enlarged faith. You can't even sell goods unless you believe in them yourself. If it is true regarding interesting people in cakes of soap or real estate bargains, how much more is it true of securing their dedication of their whole lives to a new purpose, the assent of their immortal souls to a new ideal?

At Anju the police and gendarmes fired on a crowd of manifestants and killed seven and wounded others.

At Pan Suk soldiers ruined a schoolhouse used as a church and destroyed all the Bibles and hymn books. Five men and one woman were deprived of their clothing and beaten, and one man was burned with matches. One man, between fifty and sixty, was taken to Pyengyang and beaten till he died. The wife of an elder was beaten for not telling where her husband was.

A student, 19, of no religious belief, who was wounded in the left leg by a bullet, had joined a crowd of perhaps 4,000 manifestants, who were fired on by seven gendarme officers, who killed eight men and wounded twenty.

Officials Revile Christianity

The Vice-Governor of Choong Chung Province called in prominent Koreans and advised the people to have nothing to do with Christianity, which was "a Western religion."

"From the very first day of the demonstrations," says the report, "the officials have paid more attention to Christian participation than to that of any other class. Arrests of those actually taking part in demonstrations and made upon the spot were naturally made without discrimination, but in the campaign of general arrests which followed throughout the country, Christians have been singled out for marked discrimination, even before demonstrations have taken place.

"Throughout the country the police immediately began to arrest pastors, elders, and other church officers. Some of these have been released after weeks of imprisonment and examination. Sentences against others are being daily announced, even in the case of men who took no part in the demonstrations, ranging from six months to three years of penal servitude. . . . In some places the men and women of the village were called together; all those who admitted they were Christians were maltreated or arrested and the others sent away. Wayfarers met by soldiers and gendarmes are asked whether they are Christians, and beaten and abused on the admission of the fact. Korean Christians remaining in the villages are given all sorts of announcements by local police and gendarmes. They are told that Christianity is to be exterminated, that all Christians are to be shot, that meetings are to be forbidden.

Widespread Persecution of Christians

"The effect of this treatment varies in different localities. In some places worship is entirely suspended, church officers not under arrest are in hiding, and the congregations are scattered. In some places church meetings have been forbidden; in others the services are continued, but with reduced attendance and with police detectives and spies present; in still others the disturbances have had no effect on the congregational gatherings, and many new enquirers are present, attracted doubtless by the reputation for patriotism which Christians have acquired.

"The facts are personally attested by representatives from the British and American Consulates, members of the Red Cross Society and of the Patriotic League of Britons Overseas. Photographs were taken of ruins and burned and bayoneted bodies."

If You Are a Friend of The Moody Bible Institute

Please consider, thoughtfully and prayerfully, the following:

1. That numerous great money raising campaigns are under way or in prospect for religious and social service purposes, all of them backed by large organizations, whereas there is no organization back of The Moody Bible Institute.

2. That apostasy from the fundamentals of the faith has deadened the hearts and minds of professing Christians on every hand to appeals for work such as ours.

3. That many Christian business men, givers to the Lord's work, are facing grave uncertainties on the one hand, while their profits are heavily taxed on the other.

4. That large numbers of salaried workers have received no advance in their pay, or advances much less in proportion than the heavy increases in their cost of living, thus reducing their ability to give.

5. That The Institute's operating costs are likewise heavily increased, and that the free training given our Day and Evening Classes requires about $16,000 per month, or $190,000 per year.

6. That never was enlargement and strengthening of our work so imperatively required, that increasing numbers of faithful workers shall go forth adequately trained, able to "rightly divide the Word of Truth", and equipped in spirit, heart and mind to "earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints."

7. That it is for these reasons we especially urge you to pray and give at this time.

Please send us your gift as God enables, be it little or much; and pray much that none of the circumstances above named shall avail to restrict the full measure of world wide service which God wills to go forth from this place of His appointing.

Rum's Falsehoods

By FERDINAND C. IGLE

NEXT to the signing of the Peace Treaty and its ratification by the Senate the question of War Time Prohibition is perhaps the most important one to our people. The liquor business has earned the right to be called "the father of lies." False in essence and in action its claims have been untruths. We recall the last batch of falsehoods hatched. Falsehood No. 1 was the statement that when our soldier boys came back from France they would take things in their own hands, and as a member of the New York Assembly was reported to have said, would shoot the cranks that had forced prohibition on the country in their absence. Tens of thousands of dollars were spent in newspaper advertising and otherwise in stirring up our returning soldiers into anarchy and bloodshed against prohibition. Their slanderous estimate of our boys was as foolish as it was false. Our dear boys went abroad with their lives to defend law, order, liberty, justice and truth, and came back the worst enemies the saloon could possibly have. Falsehood second was that the worl would not give up their beer, a they would raise mobs in all t and dynamite the prohibitionist brewers and distillers put these in the papers to invite such riots mistook the workingmen as they did the soldiers who have their beer pails and have no n going gunning for anti-saloon me third untruth was that President would stop the law going int July 1. The fourth lie was t President would on his return the demobilization of troops and of war prohibition. The pape lished this as a positive fact President says that there will b mobilization declared till the rati of the peace treaty and the clea of things in Germany, which wil last to the end of the year, whe stitutional prohibition will se debate and give us a dry nation gress will pass vigorous enfor laws which will be enforced. already rejected the 2.75% beer.

Christian Endeavorers Against Tobacco

THE Christian Endeavor Societies of Georgia and South Carolina at their recent convention adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas, The society ideal of Christian Endeavorers is to 'do whatever Jesus Christ would have us do'; and,

Whereas, Our Bible ideal is 'Clean hands and pure heart' (Ps. 24 : 3, 4), and to 'present our bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God' (Rom. 12 : 1), and to abstain from 'defiling the temple of God' (1 Cor. 3 : 17), and that we have left all to follow and obey Christ:

"Therefore be it resolved, That we, the Christian Endeavor Societies of Georgia and South Carolina, in convention assembled, express our devotion to these ideals, and seek to realize them in our own lives and in others' lives, by opposing, so far as we may, the use of tobacco in all forms by the young through life."

"I was astounded at my new power over men and women. People actually went out of their way to do things for me. they seemed EAGER TO PLEASE ME."

The Secret of Making People Like You

"Getting people to like you is the quick road to success—it's more important than ability," says this man. It surely did wonders for him. How he does it—a simple method which anyone can use instantly.

ALL the office was talking about it, and we were wondering which one of us would be the lucky man.

There was an important job to be filled—as Assistant-to-the-President. According to the general run of salaries in the office, this one would easily pay from $7,000 to $10,000 a year.

The main requisite, as we understood it, was striking personality and the ability to meet even the biggest men in their offices, their clubs and their homes on a basis of absolute equality. This the firm considered of even more importance than knowledge of the business.

YOU know just what happens when news of this sort gets around an office. The boys got to picking the man among themselves. They had the choice all narrowed down to two men—Harrison and myself. That was the way I felt about it, too. Harrison was big enough for the job, and could undoubtedly make a success of it. But, personally, I felt that I had the edge on him in lots of ways. And I was sure that the firm knew it too.

Never shall I forget my thrill of pleasure when the president's secretary came into my office with a cheery smile, looked at me meaningly, handed me a bulletin and said, "Mr. Frazer, here is the news about the new Assistant-to-the-President." There seemed to be a new note of added respect in her attitude toward me. I smiled my appreciation as she left my desk.

At last I had come into my own! Never did the sun shine so brightly as on that morning, and never did it seem so good to be alive! These were my thoughts as I gazed out of the window, seeing not the hurrying throngs, but vivid pictures of my new position flashing before me. And then for a further joyous thrill I read the bulletin. It said, "Effective January 1, Mr. Henry J. Peters, of our Cleveland office, will assume the duties of Assistant-to-the-President at the home office."

PETERS! Peters!—surely it could not be Peters! Why, this fellow Peters was only a branch-office salesman. . . . Personality! Why, he was only five feet four inches high, and had no more personality than a mouse. Stack him up against a big man and he would look and act like an office boy. I knew Peters well and there was nothing to him, nothing at all.

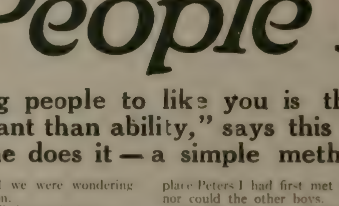
January the first came and Peters assumed his new duties. All the boys were openly hostile to him. Naturally, I felt very keenly about it, and did not exactly go out of my way to make things pleasant for him—not exactly!

But our open opposition did not seem to bother Peters. He went right on with his work and began to make good. Soon I noticed that despite my feeling against him, I was secretly beginning to admire him. He was winning over the other boys, too. It was not long before we all buried our little hatchets and palled up with Peters.

The funny thing about it was the big hit he made with the people we did business with. I never saw anything like it. They would come in and write in and telephone in to the firm and praise Peters to the skies. They insisted on doing business with him, and gave him orders of a size that made us dizzy to look at. And offers of positions!—why, Peters had almost as many fancy-figure positions offered to him as a dictionary has words.

WHAT I could not get into my mind was how a little, unassuming, ordinary-to-look-at chap like Peters could make such an impression with everyone—especially with influential men. He seemed to have an uncanny influence over people. The masterly Peters of today was an altogether different man from the common place Peters I had first met years ago. I could not figure it out, nor could the other boys.

One day at luncheon I came right out and asked Peters how he did it. I half expected him to evade. But he did not. He let me in on the secret. He said he was not afraid to do it because there was always plenty of room at the top.



"People would come in and write in and telephone in and praise Peters to the skies . he was showered with offers of fancy figure positions."

What Peters told me acted on my mind in exactly the same way as when you stand on a hill and look through binocular glasses at objects in the far distance. Many things I could not see before suddenly leaped into my mind with startling clearness. A new sense of power surged through me. And I felt the urge to put it into action.

Within a month I was getting remarkable results. I had suddenly become popular. Business men of importance who had formerly given me only a passing nod of acquaintance, suddenly showed a desire for my friendship. I was invited into the most select social circles. People—even strangers—actually went out of their way to do things for me. At first I was astounded at my new power over men and women. Not only could I get them to do what I wanted them to do, but they actually anticipated my wishes and seemed eager to please me. But let me tell you some of my experiences:

One of our biggest customers had a grievance against the firm. He held off payment of a big bill and switched to one of our competitors. I was sent to see him. He met me like a cornered tiger. A few words and I calmed him. Inside of fifteen minutes he was showering me with apologies. He gave me a check in full payment, another big order, and promised to continue giving us all his business.

For certain reasons it became necessary for the firm to obtain a signed letter from a prominent public man. Three of our men had tried, and failed. Then I was given the job. I felt I had been made the "goat." But I got the signed letter, and with it an inside tip which enabled us to land a prize order about which our competitors are still guessing and wondering.

Then trouble sprang up at one of our factories. The men talked strike. Things looked ugly. I was sent to straighten it out. On the eve of a general walkout, I pacified the men and headed off the strike. And not only this, but ever since then this factory has led all our other plants in production.

I could tell you dozens of similar instances, but they all tell the same story—the ability to make people like you, believe what you want them to believe, and to do what you want them to do. I take no personal credit for what I have done. All the credit I give to the method Peters told me about. We have told it to lots of our friends, and it has enabled them to do just as remarkable things as Peters and I have done.

Which reminds me: One of my wife's close friends moved to another town where she was a stranger. My wife of course knew of my method. She told it to her friend with the idea that it might be of assistance to her in meeting new people. It helped her so wonderfully that in a very short time she won the close friendship of many of the "best families" in the town. Everyone wonders how she did it. But WE know.

BUT YOU want to know what method I used to do all these remarkable things. It is this: You know that everyone does not think alike. What one likes another dislikes. What pleases one offends another. And what offends one pleases another. Well, there's your cue. You can make an instant hit with anyone if you say the things they want you to say and act the way they want you to act. Do this and they will surely like you, and believe in you, and will go miles out of their way to PLEASE YOU.

You can do this easily by knowing certain simple things. Written on every man, woman and child are signs, as clearly and as distinctly as though they were in letters a foot high, which show you from one quic exactly what to say and to do to please them—to get them t what you want them to believe—to think as you think—to d what you want them to do.

Knowing these simple signs is the whole secret of gett you want out of life—of making friends, of business and social ment. Every great leader uses this method. That is why leader. Use it yourself and you will quickly become a leader— can stop you. And you will want to use it if for no other reas to protect yourself against others.

WHAT Peters told me at luncheon that day was this: " Blackford's 'Reading Character at Sight.'" I did so how I learned to do all the remarkable things I have told you

You have heard of Dr. Blackford, the Master Character Many concerns will not employ a man without first getting Dr ford to pass on him. Concerns such as Westinghouse Elec Manufacturing Company, Baker-Vawter Company, Scott Company and many others pay Dr. Blackford large annual advice on dealing with human nature.

So great was the demand for these services that Dr. Blackfo not even begin to fill all engagements. So Dr. Blackford plained the method in a simple seven-lesson course entitled " Character at Sight." SHANTUNG

By RAE D. HENKLE

OARY with the frosts of the ages, lined with paths cut by the shuffling feet of countless millions of devout pilgrims, T'ai-shan looks down stolidly and imperturbably on the rphosis of China. Below, in its very shadow, birthplaces of Confucius and Mencius. To pled terraces thousands and thousands of peasants climb every year, and have climbed than four thousand years, to tell with their odies as well as with their full hearts their con- n to the gods of their fathers. For forty cen- 'ai-shan has been a sacred spot—the holy n of Shantung.

its setting almost in the center of the great f hills that reaches out from Honan northeast- d pushes into the sea to form the Shantung la, T'ai-shan looks down from its 5,060 feet cradle of Chinese religious and ethical history. ere the world's most ancient civilization spreads ever-widening waves through all of eastern It has seen the rise, the decline and the fall of might, and now, under its very shoulder, it is nrolled the evidence of the ascendancy of the ssertive, modern Japanese ideas.

Nearer the southwest, so near that from the heights shan it forms a silvery ribbon stretching away distance, is the wonderful old Grand Canal. ifting, sluggish, rather useless and inefficient ctor in modern life, the Hwang-ho seems to the economic body of China. In another oo, the Grand Canal means China. The con- of brilliant minds in the days when all the rest orld was in infancy, and the fruit of prodigious ell-directed energy, it is a picturesque and icized waterway virtually without value under nsportation conditions of today.

f Shantung province seems to have been dom- by and to have drawn its mental characteristics s three chief physical features: T'ai-shan, the nd the canal. Into this atmosphere has come y practical outer world to overturn traditions, n the pulse-beats and readjust the lives of nine millions of people.

In the f the valleys can be seen the pit heads of collier- d the steel skeletons reared above the open s of iron mines. A nation in itself, it will all purposes except administration, an appanage colony of Nippon.

ntung first came into world politics in 1898 when ny, as a result of the murder of two German naries, demanded of China the privilege of leas- ninety-nine years a few-miles-wide strip of round Kiao-chou Bay on which to build a naval nd from which she could extend a "sphere of nce" such as had been granted freely in other of China to other European powers. This strip ised 193 square miles and included the town of -tao, which was rapidly developed into one of the modern and substantial towns on the China gland at this time was possessed of several im- "spheres of influence," including almost all ng-tse valley, but alarmed by the appearance of Germany in North China, and the aggressive attitude of Russia in Manchuria and Inner Mongolia and her gradual encroachment on Peking, demanded for herself a counterbalancing concession in Shantung. Her representations won for her the port of Wei-hai-wei, near the entrance to the Gulf of Pe-chili, with 285 square miles of adjacent territory. The Wei-hai-wei agreement was signed on July 1, 1898, only a few months after the establishment of the Germans.

With the cession of Kiao-chou went extensive ry valuable mining and railroad rights in the land, with equally valuable privileges of trade.

China now had lost control under conditions of extra-territoriality of three of her most important strategic points in the general region of Peking: Kiao-chou to the Germans, Wei-hai-wei to the British, and Port Arthur to the Russians. In 1905 Japan succeeded to the rights of Russia in Port Arthur, but some balance of power was maintained until 1914, when Japan dispossessed Germany and compelled China, six months later, to consent to the transfer of all German rights and interests to her. The peace treaty now confirms this Sino-Japanese agreement under an indefinite understanding that Kiao-chou, with the exception of Tsing-tao, will be returned to China, while Japan continues in possession of all the mines, railroads and other public works developed by Germany in the province of Shantung.

Theoretically, govermental control of the province will rest in Peking at some time in the future when the Japanese army is withdrawn. Practically, however, there seems no doubt it will remain in the hands of Japan or her agents, for where trade, industrial and police monopoly lie, there will be the actual physical control. And Japan, under the terms of the treaty of peace, is confirmed in these monopolies.

Strategically, Japan has outflanked her British ally. Established at Port Arthur on the north and Tsing-tao on the south with military strongholds, it is not without the bounds of possibility that she may be able, under the guise of her conceded rights, to establish a strong potential base on the shores of Lia-chou Bay where her troops disembarked for the march on Kiao-chou, or at Che-foo. From either point she would absolutely dominate, with Port Arthur, the narrow strait that leads to the Gulf of Pe-chili and thence to Tien-tsin and Peking. Her position in Lia-chou Bay already has elements of strength. Large preparations were made there for the advance against Kiao-chou and the subsequent siege of the Germans. It has remained, for the four years and a half intervening, a base of operations for the large Japanese force holding the interior of Shantung, and it is to be doubted that all the construction work necessary to such a purpose will be demolished or wholly abandoned.

In practical effect, then, the Yellow Sea after years of a thorough internationalization through the presence of Germany, Russia, England and Japan along its shores, has become a Japanized lake, with England at Wei-hai-wei as the only Occidental representative.

Economically, Japan has won for future development and exploitation what is probably the richest province in all China. Others are larger in mileage. Others have larger potential wealth in coal or iron or oil. But there is not a province which combines such diversified natural resources, large population and ease of access, as Shantung.

Germany systematically and effectively, for the most part in cooperation with the Chinese, began the improvement of the interior as soon as she was established in Kiao-chou. Railroads were surveyed back from the port and slowly a line was pushed westward until an excellent roadbed was completed—the 280-odd miles between Tsing-tao and the provincial capital, Chi-nan-fu. This line was eventually extended on to the northwest until it met the main Chinese railway, the Lu-han line, which runs from Peking south to Hankow on the Yangtse-kiang. The Lu-han has numerous branches and connects at Peking with the Chinese Eastern, which provides a through route via Harbin and Irkutsk to Moscow, Warsaw, Berlin and Paris.

The Tsing-tao-Chi-nan-fu line is fed by several branches reaching in to the hill country east of Chi-nan-fu and tapping extensive coal and iron fields opened and developed by German capital. The capital has become a junction point on the Shanghai-Peking road which comes up from Shanghai and Nanking through the southwestern portion of Shantung, and there is under construction now a road about 190 miles in length which will make direct connection between this line and Tsing-tao. In addition, another road has been surveyed and partly constructed following the Pe-chili coastline around from the west to Che-foo, with branches making accessible new regions, both agricultural and mining.

Three coal fields, extensive in area and with an excellent quality of fuel, provide the bulk of the freight traffic for these provincial railroads. Some idea of the value of the deposits may be gathered from the fact that at the end of the first ten years of their active operation—a period ending in 1910—the three fields produced annually 500,000 tons of bituminous and 450,000 tons of anthracite. This tonnage grew steadily in the four years preceding the outbreak of the war and in 1915 operations were resumed on a large scale by the Japanese. No production figures have become available for the period of Japanese control, but estimates have run as high as 1,000,000, for both bituminous and anthracite.

Iron ore deposits have been opened within easy reach of the coal fields and plans have been drawn for converters which, when erected, will give to the Shantung district a more compact iron and steel production center than any area in the world unless it be that of Birmingham, Ala., or Essen, Germany, with 100,000,000 tons of ore surveyed. It will be almost literally possible to carry coal into the coke ovens and thence into the furnaces in the same conveyers that bear the ore from the mine mouth. Combined with a wage scale for native labor of not more than one dollar (Mexican) a day for what in the United States would class at the very least as semi-skilled labor, Japanese advantages over all competitors in the Far Eastern steel market are obvious.

But Shantung has more beneath her surface than coal and iron. Copper and lead are found in quantities which promise to make their development extremely profitable, although serious work has barely begun in that direction. Only forty miles southwest of Che-foo is one of the best gold mines in China—that of Chou-yuen—and both placer and shaft mines are found at several other places in the province. Diamonds in commercial quantities and of very good quality, deposits of gypsum and an exceptional grade of pottery clay also have been uncovered.

It is not in mineral wealth alone, however, that Shantung is fortunate. The soil in her numerous valleys is very fertile and produces wheat, beans, cotton, peanuts, and rice in abundance. In fact, of the area of the province outside the mountainous districts, there is only a strip from twenty-five to one hundred miles in width on both banks of the Hwang-ho's lower course which is not economically valuable. This comparatively small section is low land, taken up almost entirely by salt marshes for which no use has yet been found.

The opening of the district to commerce brought with it considerable stimulation of silk cultivation and in recent years numerous mills have been established, first by German and then by Japanese capital. The latter have centered at Che-foo, which rapidly became one of the most important ports of China for the export of the cheaper grades of raw silk. While the Shantung product is somewhat inferior in quality due to the absence of the mulberry tree and the use of oak leaves for feeding the worms, it fills an important place in the trade and brings an immense revenue to the growers.

The wax industry, too, is a big factor in the life of the province and is watched and cultivated as carefully as the silk. The tiny insects are placed on the trees in the early spring. At the close of the summer they have produced a peculiar fibrous substance which, when melted, forms the wax of commerce. In the autumn the insects are removed from the trees, taken indoors, and preserved in a fairly even temperature through the winter, when they are again put to work. The peasants found the trees were gradually destroyed by the action of the insects, but knowing little of reforestation there was danger that in a comparatively brief time this source of wealth would disappear. Fortunately the Japanese quickly recognized the peril and they have introduced widely fresh orchards and are encouraging the planting of young trees on areas occupied by the old and declining growths.

The natives of Shantung, through the presence of several score missionary schools and the intense commercial activity of the Germans while they were in control of Kiao-chou, made rapid strides toward real industrial efficiency. While the overwhelming proportion of the population is agriculturally engaged, native labor was used exclusively for the construction and working of mines and railroads, harbor works, roads and other quasi-public improvements, and it has become well accustomed to modern habits of life and work except in the more remote regions.

With the arrival of the Japanese in 1914 a period of intensive development of the country began and thousands of the lower class Japanese immigrants were encouraged to cross over to Tsingtao and move back into the interior. Some clashes bet natives and the immigrants occurred wl while still greater numbers of natives we

Rioting in Shanghai in protest against the peace treaty disposition of Shantung

The Fight in Washington Over Peace

A NEW and sensational turn in the peace treaty discussion in the Senate came in the proposal to attach to the French treaty new clauses which will bind France to act with the United States in resisting any changes in Asia or in the Pacific Ocean which may constitute a menace to the United States and to the peace of the world.

The French treaty is regarded by many diplomats here as unique, in that it is absolutely one-sided. All contracts between nations, as well as between individuals, are usually based on reciprocal obligations. In the French treaty it is only the United States which assumes an obligation.

The United States binds itself to go immediately to the aid of France in the event of an unprovoked movement of aggression being made against her by Germany. The French Government assumes no obligation whatever to the United States in return for this assurance of protection to France.

It has been charged by the Chinese representatives in Washington that the representatives of Japan in Paris solicited from Great Britain and France a secret agreement by which Great Britain and France were to side with Japan on all future questions involving control in Asia and over the Pacific. The Chinese representatives assert most positively they know that such proposals were made by Japan.

The proposed amendment of the French treaty provides a way in which this knowledge may be definitely obtained. If they have entered into no such arrangement with Japan, no good reason can be advanced why they should not obligate themselves to stand with the United States on Asiatic questions. They know that the United States has no disposition to aggrandize itself in Asia.

They know that the United States is the one nation whose conduct in the past with respect to Far Eastern matters has been controlled absolutely by its conception of the best interests of the Asiatics and absolutely uninfluenced by any selfish consideration.

IT IS the concensus of observers in Washington that the situation is shaping itself for a compromise on some of the hotly debated clauses.

Privately, the President's supporters admit there is little chance that he will be able to force the document through the Senate without some reservations or amendments. They are fighting now to make the changes as mild as possible. Mr. Wilson is holding a series of conferences with members of both parties.

The feature of the treaty which is arousing the most bitter debate is the group of articles virtually granting the province of Shantung, in China, to Japan. So important has this loomed, not only in the Senate but in the country at large, that the President is understood to have resorted to diplomacy in an endeavor to persuade Japan to make some formal and public statement of her intentions in Shantung. He believes such a statement should contain the official Japanese promise to restore Chinese sovereignty over the province, together with the date on which this action shall take place. A pronouncement of this character in Tokio, he believes, would do much to allay a very definite American distrust of Japan's motives and smooth away at least one impediment to ratification of the treaty.

The fact that word came from Tokio on July 26 that the government was starting an inquiry into the Shantung issue is taken to indicate that there is a very keen appreciation there of the necessity of clearing the international atmosphere. But it is certain an "inquiry" will not satisfy the friends of China in the Senate.

There is general admission on the part of administration leaders that China was sacrificed to gain Japanese support for the League of Nations, but the defense is offered that the end justifies the means. Critics point to Japan's unfavorable record of aggression in the Far East, America's long protestations of friendship for China, our leadership in the maintenance of her integrity, and our assurances of support when we induced her to declare war against Austria and Germany, and then declare that our abandonment of her now to the mercies of Japan savors of treachery to an ally.

OPPOSITION to the administration treaty program extended further than the provisions relating to the Orient, however. On July 22 the Senate committee on foreign affairs refused to grant a request by the President for approval of the provisional appointment of an American member of the reparations committee on the ground that until the treaty is ratified no power exists to execute any of its provisions, either provisionally or otherwise.

On the 24th, Senator Lodge, chairman of the foreign relations committee, introduced a resolution asking the President to submit the text of the Franco-American treaty which is a part of the Anglo-Franco-American understanding entered into in Paris at the request of Premier Clemenceau for the future protection of France from Germany. Article 4 of that document provides that it shall be submitted to the ratifying bodies of the three interested nations simultaneously with the submission of the German treaty. Senator Lodge called attention to the fact that it had been widely published in the press in this country and abroad, and that it had been ratified earlier in the week by England, and insisted that it should properly be before the Senate.

The foreign relations committee has decided to postpone further action on the treaty of peace until the treaty of alliance is submitted by the President. Following this decision, the Colombian treaty, intended to settle the long-standing dispute between the United States and Colombia growing out of the secession of Panama, was taken under consideration.

FROM the political standpoint, the most important development of the week in relation to the peace treaty was the publication of a letter from ex-President William H. Taft to Will Hays, Republican national chairman, recommending five interpretations to be appended to the League of Nations covenant. Mr. Taft has been the President's most consist porter among Republicans. The most i points he brings out relate to a more definit tion of the Monroe Doctrine, a reductio British Empire's votes in the league counci instead of six, a declaration of the unq right of the United States to withdraw league in ten years, assurance that all the pr of the league council be governed by the principles of international law, and a de excluding from the authority of the leag specified internal affairs as control of imn and customs revenue.

Mr. Wilson, on the 26th, answered a thre old request of the Senate for information a ments bearing on the proceedings of th conference in a letter which promised what he had brought home with him as soon as be sorted out and indexed.

In the meantime action on the treaty by is being delayed. France is strongly in serious modifications, both in the league and the treaty proper, and she intends to vote in the United States Senate before she irr commits herself.

Marquis Okuma Urges Philipp Independence

MARQUIS OKUMA, Japan's first war pre of the "elder statesman" and probably influential of the empire's older leaders, has e himself in an interview as strongly in favor o dependence of the Philippine Islands. He reason, he says, why he should favor the co occupation of the Philippines by a wester which thus maintains a foothold in Asia. Th view, given to Señor Pardo de Tavera, forme ippine commissioner, expresses the hope t cordial relations between the Filipinos and t anese will be greatly extended, and he urges t ulation of tourist and commercial travel betw Philippines and Japan.

As a pronounced reactionary, Marquis Ok the native intellectuals he has been known f

as "the sage of Waseda."

The interview on the Philippines and A peace treaty and the league of nations in the as another important argument against enc

the active or latent policy in Tokio to exclu western powers from any participation in Far affairs.

THE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEEK

Soldiers on Guard in Washington

N ARLY 2,000 soldiers and marines, including avalry from Fort Myers, Va., have been on n Washington, D. C., to bring an end to the series tly race riots. The men patrolled the city in trucks, motor cycles and automobiles mount- achine-guns, while reserves were held at numer- ntral points for emergency calls.

Great Strikes Ended

O strikes of particular importance to the orld's business were settled during the last . A great walk-out of English miners which ened the paralysis of British industry to an end on July 25 when the Miners' ation reached an agreement with Premier George and other representatives of the nment. The Last Joss Is Gone is only another, but perhaps one of the final, that for a decade have been transforming the atown of the metropolis into a thoroughly Amer- zed Christian community. With the joss have most of the oriental traditions and customs.

to the old home of the idol has moved the Chi- Association, the most powerful organization of kind in the United States. The association is nthropic, juridical and social, and all the serious ulties of all the Chinese in America are brought ultimately for solution. Its head now is the . Lee To. Born in China, he came to this country boy, returned to the orient a few years later to me a student in the theological department of Baptist academy in Canton, came back to the es for a course at the Bible Teacher's school in York City, and in 1903 he was ordained a Bap- minister in Spokane, Wash.

What Insurrection Meant to Egypt

HE British war office on July 24 made public the cost in lives of a partial suppression of the nation- revolt in Egypt. According to figures forwarded General Sir E. H. H. Allenby, commander-in-chief he British forces, the casualties among European lians were 31 killed and 35 wounded. The British tary lost 29 killed and 114 wounded, while the ive rebels lost 800 killed and 1690 wounded. In ition, 39 natives were executed, 27 were sentenced ife imprisonment and more than 2,000 to short on terms.

he disorders began on March 20 at Assuit and ead rapidly. For a time the situation got entirely of the control of the Egyptian garrison, and trans- ts loaded with Australian troops returning home n France and England were stopped and the troops mbarked to reinforce the garrison. Some bitter ing developed among the Australians as a result his action, but the men from the south seas readjusted themselves and aided materially in bringing about a semblance of order in lower Egypt.

While the revolt is not entirely suppressed, and disturbances occur spasmodically, the decision of the government to permit a nationalist delegation to proceed to London has had a quieting effect.

Prohibition Enforcement

THE temperance forces of the country won another big victory on June 22, when the House passed the prohibition enforcement law by a vote of 287 to 100. The measure is drastic enough to cause the prediction by its supporters that it will effectually suppress the liquor traffic. The "wets" fought to the last, but at no time was it anything but a hopeless fight.

The law provides, among other things, that while liquor may be stored in homes the burden of proof rests on the owner that he acquired and possesses it lawfully; that an intoxicant is any beverage that contains more than one-half per cent alcohol; that it may not be used in a public place; that any vehicle transporting liquor may be seized, and that a building where it is made or sold may be condemned as a nuisance.

The bill was sent immediately to the senate for action by that body. The senate has an enforcement measure of its own, however, and besides, it does not intend to take up consideration of the question until after the peace treaty is disposed of. No senator will predict when that time will be reached.

Army food supplies stored in great bulk awaiting distribution for public use

The day after action was taken in the house, Federal Judge Chatfield, of Brooklyn, sitting in the Connecticut district, held the manufacture and sale of 2.75 per cent. beer to be illegal. The next day in a supplementary decision, he upheld the constitutionality of the war time prohibition act.

While the prohibition cause was receiving impetus from court and Congress the liquor interests announced from Chicago that they have arranged for the filing of referendum petitions demanding the submission of the prohibition amendment to popular vote in Maine, Michigan, Missouri and Nevada. Similar petitions already have been filed in Ohio, California, Colorado, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska and Washington.

To Repeal Reciprocity

REPEAL of the Canadian Reciprocity Act of 1911 was recommended July 26, by the House Ways and Means Committee. Some Democrats joined with the Republicans in voting for repeal, but others said that action should be deferred pending further investigation. Measures designed to give tariff protection to several industries started as war necessities also were recommended.

Our Loans to Allies

THE United States now holds $9,615,400,527.65 worth of I O U's of the Allies.

This total was reached July 26, when a new loan was made to France of $157,549,000. France alone now owes the United States $3,010,026,800, the Treasury Department announced.

It is reported here that an appeal has been made to American bankers for financial aid for Italy to the extent of $1,000,000,000.

Training Preachers for the Outdoors

BOSTON UNIVERSITY, as a part of the Methodist Centenary plans, will, this fall, establish a Chair of Rural Ministry.

The new department will have courses for college men planning to enter the rural field and pastors now serving rural parishes. Arrangements will be made to relieve country ministers for this special training and efforts will be intensified to enlist men for the rural ministry.

Selling the Army's Surplus Food

THE picture shows a fleet of army motor trucks transporting surplus army food to convenient sales points. The War Department is slowly disposing of excess supplies, but a move to sell them to municipalities has been virtually blocked by the legal opinion that municipal charters rarely permit the use of public funds for the purpose of buying food. An effort is being made in Congress to force the Secretary of War to place on the domestic market more than $120,000,000 of foodstuffs stored in army warehouses. The idea is to make the stocks available for purchase by the public at little more than cost price. A report by a congressional committee submitted to the house on July 24 says that only $12,000,000 of food supplies has been sold in the United States and that much of it had greatly deteriorated in quality.

Korea as One Japanese Sees It

EVIDENCE from Japanese sources of Japanese ill-treatment of Koreans continues to multiply. The Christian Herald in its issue of August 2 published an article from the Japan Advertiser, a leading Tokio journal, telling of the terrible conditions among the natives, and making it very plain that much of the cruelties of which the world has heard are religious persecutions. The Tokio Gokyo (Guardian) in its July edition prints a report prepared by the Rev. K. Ishizaka of the Japanese Methodist church, and Gilbert Bowles, representing the Friends' Mission of America. These men, with two other delegates representing the federation of Japanese churches, recently made a study of the Korean situation. The report contradicts the generally admitted understanding that religious intolerance actuates the Japanese authorities, but it also absolves the foreign missionaries who have been accused by the Japanese Government of inciting the widespread passive revolt of the natives.

Mr. Ishizaka attributes much of the discontent among the Koreans to discrimination against them, especially in matters of trade and education, and he says he has received numerous complaints that the Japanese people and government seem to look on the Korean as "a beast and not a human being."

Church Unity at Work

NOROTON, Conn., laymen are getting together. Recently a union supper and entertainment was given in the Presbyterian vestry by laymen of the Presbyterian, Episcopal and Catholic Churches, all three pastors being present and expressing a hope that closer association might become a fact.

During the summer in Brooklyn, N. Y., the First Baptist, South Third Street Presbyterian and St. John's Methodist Sunday Schools have been meeting together in the Methodist Church. The three churches have also been holding union prayer meeting.

RELIGIOUS

Restoring Persian Missions. The Presbyterian Missionaries who were driven from Urumia, Persia, by the Turks in 1918 were able to return from Tabriz in May. They had left behind a work, begun in 1835, which included an American school for Boys, a theological training class, a Seminary for Girls attended by Syrians, Persians and Jews, twenty-nine churches, a well-equipped hospital and a printing plant. The amount needed to reestablish the work has been recently reported to the Presbyterian Board as $237,000. The mission force numbers twenty-four. All along the route from Tabriz to Urumia the missionaries passed groups of beggars, hungry, ragged, shelterless, old and young pleading for alms. Of several thousand in Hamadan under the care of the American Committee nearly 3,000 were Syrians of the better educated and formerly well-to-do class.

Widening Woman's Responsibility. The Protestant Episcopal Church is considering a new canon to be presented to the triennial convention in Detroit

MY OVERSEAS EXPERIENCES

Our Soldier Boys and Prohibition—I Fall Into a Friendly Colored Ambush—Aix-les-Bains an Restful Charms—"This IS Heaven"—France Ripe for Spiritual Revival

By HOMER A. RODEHEAVER

The old slide trombone in the Neuilly Hospital in Paris

SOME people have been asking the question, "Will the American soldier boys be disappointed when they come back and find that we have voted for prohibition in this country?" No, I think they will be pleased; that is, the majority. Of course, some will feel that it has taken away certain of their inalienable rights, but they would have felt that way anyway. I believe it is illustrated by this story, because these men about whom I will tell you were mixing with the soldiers constantly, and knew better than any one else their feeling, and you can tell from the end of the story that they were not prejudiced either way.

On the dining-car, coming from Paris to Saumur, I took the only seat left in the car, by the side of a splendid-looking Frenchman. I soon discovered that he spoke English perfectly. Just across the table were two American lieutenants. All of them were drinking wine or beer—in fact, I think everybody in the car was drinking wine or beer except myself. Just for fun, I turned to this Frenchman and said:

"Would you please tell me how I can order a bottle of water?"

He smiled and said, "I will order the water for you."

In a little while he said to the group of us, "I suppose your American boys will be very much disappointed when they go back home to find that their country has gone dry."

Quite naturally I expected these lieutenants who were drinking to agree with him. Very much to my surprise, one of them looked up and said, "Not on your life! Most of the American soldier boys are going to be mighty glad to get back to a country where they are not being constantly tempted by the open door of the saloon. Many of them have suffered because of booze, and many others have seen what it does to people who use it constantly. So they will be glad to get back to a country that will be different from this."

The other lieutenant spoke up and said, "You are right. I drink a little myself, sometimes, but I have found out I am really better off without it. I used to live in Milwaukee, where I could get all kinds of booze easily, so I drank it, and got to the place where I thought I could not get along without it. However, I moved out West to a dry territory. It was very difficult to get booze, and so I got away from it entirely. I know that I felt better physically, and was better mentally, and did my work better and more efficiently, and got along in every way better without the booze."

Then he addressed the Frenchman and said, "That is what is the matter with your people over here. While they do not drink to excess and get drunk, many of them stay pickled in this stuff most of the time. After a man sits down and drinks about a quart of this wine at a meal, he does not feel like going out and working, but he wants to lie down and go to sleep. That is the reason the people of France have made no more progress than they have. They have been easily satisfied, and have not had the energy to try to improve conditions."

IN ALL my work in the front line area, I did not find ten centers that were sufficiently supplied with Testaments—and every single time I invited the boys to come and get a War Roll Card and sign it, or to come and get a Testament, with possibly two exceptions, they signed all the cards we had in a very little while, or carried off all the Testaments that the Y. M. C. A. secretary had in stock, and wanted more. Of course it was necessary to get the ammunition and foodstuffs to the front line, but again I say it was unfair to deprive a boy who is going to his death of the religious comfort that he might have gotten from the privilege of signing this War Roll Card, or of having his little Testament in his pocket when he went "over the top."

One Sunday afternoon I had a service for a great crowd of men about eight miles from the front line. They were moving that day to the front lines to go into battle. I had tried to get some War Roll Cards, but there were none in that section. I had only one left in my pocket. After talking to the men, and singing for them, I told them about the War Roll Card. Then I told the Captain in charge of these men that I would give him the one I had, and any fellow who wanted to do so could make a copy of it, sign it, and we would be glad to send it in for him. The Captain took the little card, looked it over, took me off to one side and said,

"Mr. Rodeheaver, if you don't mind, I'd like to sign this card myself. I have a wife and two babies back in the Southland, and a dear old father and mother there. They all belong to the Church—they have always wanted me to join them, but, like so many men, I have simply put it off. I am going into battle tomorrow, and of course we never know what is going to happen. I would like to have the folks at home to have the satisfaction of knowing that I accepted this proposition and signed this War Roll Card."

That was the feeling of thousands of men in France who had no chance of signing a War Roll Card.

THE colored men were very curious about all the different implements of warfare. A little shriveled, freckled-faced yellow darky from down in Alabama walked up to one of the gunners of a great battery one day, saluted, and said:

"Cap'n, would you mind tellin' me how fah dis gun can shoot?"

The officer in charge said, "Twenty-five miles, George."

With a very quizzical look on his face, as he started on down the road with his shovel on his shoulder, he said, "Lawsy goodness! Lawsy goodness! Twenty-five miles! Niggah run all day long, and git shot at night!"

Coming down from the front line one day, I found a great crowd of about a thousand colored men drawn up by the side of the road waiting for me. They had heard I was up there, and they thought that sure way to stop me—to be all ready for sor as I came through. They seemed to know right, because I never could pass a crowd li and although I had been singing and playing we stopped the little aluminum Elizabeth we were riding, took out a folding organ, on a little platform in front of these men, an the music. I was facing the west where the just gone down, leaving a red glow in the s in front of me was this army of black fa their white teeth and the whites of their eyes ated; just above the tops of their heads was glow caused by the setting sun, dissolvin in the sky into the wonderful blue of the France, with here and there white fleecy Off to our left was an American airplane, a off to our right was a German airplane. W tell it was German because our anti-aircr were throwing shells around it, and as th bursting the smoke was white. The smoke f anti-aircraft shells was white and the smo the German anti-aircraft shells was black— fully significant of the character of the two This wonderful tone-picture was accompanie dull roar of the battle that was going on just distance over toward the red glow.

Standing there in the midst of these conditions, constantly reminded of the hor frightfulness of war, with that wonderful spread out before me, I started to sing one old "down-South" melodies, one that these b heard in the cabins on the plantations, dow cotton fields and the corn fields of the Sou and at their "camp-meetin's" of other days started to sing, this whole crowd of dark- men caught the spirit immediately, and join their regular way. As they started to sin bodies swayed to the rhythm of the song:

"Goin' to lay down my swo'd and shi
Down by the rivah side
Down by the rivah side
Down by the rivah side;
Goin' to lay down my swo'd and shi
Down by the rivah side;
Ain't a-goin' to study wah no mo'!"

Then when we launched out on the choru throated, wonderful harmony—

"Ain't a-goin' to study wah no mo',
Ain't a-goin' to study wah no mo',
Ain't a-goin' to study wah no mo'!"

One other time which left an indelible imp on my mind was when we found a great cro colored men—wood-cutters back in the woods. was a little open place in these woods wher camped. I stood on a pile of wood, and these c fellows gathered around me, forming a co circle. It was at the time in the fall of the year the leaves have their most gorgeous colors. I sible this is even more gorgeous than in ou country. At least it appeared to me so at that It looked as if the falling rain-drops had caught the rainbow the different colors and spread over these leaves. This was the border just the rim of black faces on this occasion. Agai we could hear the rumble of the guns in the dis and again here, as we started to sing, the crowd, joining in with me, swayed to the rh of the song. We sang a hymn of heaven, lo forward to that reunion of the future after we quit studying about war. Here is the song:

"I got-a shoes,
You got-a shoes,
All God's chillen got-a shoes:
When I get to heab'n goin' t' put on my sh
Goin' t' walk all over God's heab'n.

"Heab'n! Heab'n!
Everybody talk about Heab'n ain't goin' th
Heab'n! Heab'n!
Goin' t' walk all over God's heab'n!"

I asked the commander in charge of this parti group of darkies if the Y. M. C. A. had been to send any man out to give them any reli services. He said, "We don't need anybody out to this group. We have five preachers i group of colored men, and they have a regular ing every night."

THE great leave-area work of the Y. M. is a big subject in itself. One of the most fa is Aix-les-Bains. This is one of the famous res

, and it was here possibly the greatest gam- no in the world was located. The Y. M. C. A. r this great casino with its magnificent seating between two and three thousand ınd the great moving picture theater; small- for small concerts and entertainments, and lobby for all sorts of games and dancing and adidly equipped cafeteria—all this under ould entertain at Aix-les-Bains between four thousand soldiers at one time. They would ered in the best rooms of all the magnificent this wonderful watering-place. A doughboy 'arm in Indiana or the prairies of Kansas aw a suite of rooms that had been occupied yalty of all Europe and visiting millionaires United States. It was all the same to the doughboy, however, because all his life king. Everything in the way of entertain- as free to the soldier boy—planned and l by the Y. M. C. A.—his board and lodging by the government. After seven months m home, nearly two months in the front hes, two American soldier boys were relieved on their leave to Aix-les-Bains. They went arly their first night, and woke up about ck in a wonderful soft bed with real soft between real white sheets, in a beautiful room. One looked to see if the other was ınd then he said, "Well, it's all over now." said, "What do you mean?" He replied, This ain't real." Again his pal said, "Yes, are on our leave; we are down at Aix-les- we are in a room at a hotel." His friend s head and said, "No, that can't be—you're is time. I tell you this cannot be real. We th been over the top and have been killed, is heaven."

incident expresses better than anything I e opinion of the American soldier boy about e-area: Two boys were taken up to a beautiful As their conductor opened the door, they n and saw a beautifully polished floor. Before uld go in they reached down, took off their and heavy shoes and walked in in their feet so as not to mar the beautiful polish loor. One boy said, "I really could not believe they showed me was for me until after the man it and shut the door and left me in there."

Then we ought to have a whole chapter for the girls of the Y. M. C. A., because in France many of the Y. M. C. A. secretaries were girls—some of the finest of all American women giving their services in this capacity. They did splendid, hard, faithful, efficient work, but even if they had only been there for the boys to look at and talk to, it would have been worth while. It is not an easy task when you are away from the refining influences of the mother, the sister, the sweetheart and the home to keep constantly before us just the right kind of ideals. Temptations are unusually strong, and in some cases unusually attractive. The presence of the girls of the Y. M. C. A. added just the right kind of a touch to the hut or to the Y. M. C. A. leave-area to give the boy new faith and strength and courage to keep himself fine and clean and strong and worthy of the love of the mother, the sister, the sweetheart, and in some instances the wife at home.

One big, bashful boy at Aix-les-Bains stood a part of every one of his eight days leaning against a post and watching a splendid American girl who worked behind a counter. She looked his way and smiled, but he looked very bashful and did not attempt to speak to her, and would hardly smile in return. On the last day of his leave he came to her with a long package carefully wrapped in paper. He said: "Miss, please excuse me, but I just wanted to ask if you will accept this little present from me. I ain't much like the other boys—not even back home did I have much to do with the girls. I have always been a backward sort of a fellow, but it has just been mighty nice to be able to see you here because you have reminded me so much of some of our own women-folks back home. You ain't seemed to mind my looking at you, and I just wanted to know if you would accept this little present from me." She thanked him, and unrolling the paper from the package she found two beautiful long-stemmed roses. On one he had tied a bunch of grapes and on the other two plums. This was an offering of greater value to this American girl than any medal, cup or anything else that might have been offered her.

STANDING in a pair of number eleven army shoes and upon his rights as an American citizen, a big husky, shiny black man from Alabama, U. S. A., looked around on the strange and unusual sights of the city of Bordeaux, France. He had just gotten off a transport with several thousand others of his kind, and he had a couple of hours' leave of absence. He walked up to another shiny black man, apparently very much like himself, and said:

"Bo, c'n yo' tell me wheah is de Y. M. C. A.?"

This second black man had on a red cap. He looked a trifle embarrassed, if black men can look embarrassed, and he replied:

"Je ne parle pas l'Anglais."

Said our friend from Alabama: "Now looky heah, nigger, Ah ain't got no time fo' foolin' around heah, so doan yo' try any of them hifalutin' stunts on me. Ah am asking yo' in good ol' U. S. wheah is de Y. M. C. A., an' Ah wants yo' to answer me in the same way."

The man in the red cap seemed very much more confused and again he said:

"Je ne sais pas. Je regret beaucoup de ne parler pas l'Anglais."

By this time the Alabama man was very much excited and he said: "Now looky heah, nigger, Ah aint got no time to be foolin' with you. Ah doan like them niggers with hifalutin' ideas nohow. Ah's jes' goin' to give you one more chance an' if yo' doan tell me in plain U. S. wheah is this Y. M. C. A., Ah's gwine to bus' yo' in de jaw. Ah'll hit yo' so hard on de top of yo' haid yo'll have a stone bruise on both of yo' heels. Now wheah is that Y. M. C. A.?"

Once more our friend with the red cap tried to be polite and explain that he did not understand, but he got just about three French words out of his mouth when a big fist about the size of a ham and as hard as an anvil connected with the point of his jaw. It was several minutes before the emergency aid man could bring him around and I doubt if even today he understands the cause of all this trouble.

The man with the red cap was one of the Moroccan black men; he looked just exactly like an Alabama darky; our man from Alabama had never seen any black men who could talk anything but English, so he quite naturally thought this man with the red cap was simply trying to put on airs.

The colored men are inherently religious. They are like children in their faith. The Y. M. C. A. had passed out little khaki Testaments to all who wanted them. One darky was heard to remark to another. "Yes—a lot o' dese yere fellers never had nothin' in dere han's befo' but dice. Dey all got a little tan Testament now."

THE VALLEY FORGE MEMORIAL

A HIGH standard of our future war memorials has been established on the scene of the famous Valley Forge encampment. The several structures already completed with those in contemplation are worthy of our best traditions. In contrast to many conven- war monuments throughout the the new chapel with its Cloister of lonies is especially appropriate to asion. The group will be completed erection of a Thanksgiving Tower ting the entire encampment, at the which will be hung appropriately ce chime of thirteen bells.

entire area occupied by the encamp- is today comprised in the Valley Memorial Park, which includes undred and sixty acres. It was ac- by the State of Pennsylvania in nd has since been carefully restored. ds of half a million dollars has been ed in the memorials and in beauti- he grounds. The encampment lies enty miles from Philadelphia and is ly visited by more than a quarter illion people.

site of the camp has witnessed few s in a century and a half and many ting relics of the past have been pre- intact. The double line of en- ments which surrounded the camp till be traced in many places. The s huts which sheltered Washington's hroughout the long cold winter have eared except a few foundations and walls, but the streets they once are still clearly indicated. Several forts which commanded the ap- es to the camp have been carefully restored. d maps prepared under Washington's direction, are still preserved, enable the visitor to recall details of the past.

most interesting relic of the park is the familiar uarters occupied by Washington throughout ng winter. The building is remarkably well preserved and has recently been refurnished much as in Washington's time. The front parlor where Washington held his councils of war and the narrow dining-room where many distinguished guests were entertained appear exactly the same as in Washington's day. The ancient forge which gave the valley its name stands near by. The village blacksmith who shod the horses of the Continental Army has been replaced by a dispenser of gasoline. Even the village schoolhouse, dating from 1705, which was used as a hospital for the soldiers, has been completely restored.

Detail of the "Defenders' Gate," Valley Forge

The group of memorial buildings occupies a commanding position on the crest of a low hill overlooking the encampment. Its beautiful Gothic lines may be seen from all parts of the Park. A temporary frame chapel has stood for several years on this site, where regular services have been held. The first building of the group to be completed has been the Memorial Chapel, which is itself an architectural gem both in its general form and its interior decorations. Every detail contributes to this effect. The pulpit, perclose and lectern are memorials, the screens commemorating the Brigadier General at Valley Forge. There are tablets bearing the names of signers of the Declaration of Independence, and the font and pews and other details bear inscriptions which recall great names of the past. At every turn some memorial repeats some familiar name or date associated with the Revolution.

Adjoining the Chapel is a series of stone bays known as the Cloister of the Colonies, built in the form of a rectangle. There are thirteen of these bays, erected by the patriotic societies of the original colonies. The open windows look down upon the valley below and the scene of the encampment. The bay commemorating New York contains a graceful open air pulpit beyond the line of the Cloister.

A remarkable museum of historic relics has already been collected at Valley Forge. It will eventually be housed in a special building to be called the Patriot's Hall, adjoining the Memorial. The collection includes the tent which Washington occupied in the early days of the encampment, and many interesting relics of the period. A special wing will be constructed to house the Washington Memorial Library, for which 25,000 volumes have already been collected. The porch of the Allies, similar to the Cloister of the Colonies, will be a feature of the group. In another part of the encampment the Federal Government has erected a great marble arch at an expense of $100,000. Scattered about the park are scores of monuments and markers which serve to recall the stirring history of the encampment.

THE GIFTS OF THE NATIONS

In Americanizing the Aliens We Are Enriching Our Whole Citizenship

By GRACE HUMPHREY

GROWING out of Liberty Loan work in Chicago came an organization of foreign-speaking citizens with a woman's committee that included twenty-seven nationalities. And from this came the "Gifts of the Nations"—fortnightly demonstrations of what each people was contributing to America. Pole and Italian, Chinese and Russian, Croatian and Greek, Armenian, Bohemian and many another, men and women and children, they came bearing their gifts. There were talks on the history of their native lands, exhibits of their art, their handicrafts and costumes; their foods were served, their music played, their dances given. So popular were these programs that each time guests were turned away, and engagements to repeat them before clubs were made for months ahead.

Chicago's problem, however, is different from that of any other place in the land. Among her enormous population of foreign-born she can pick and choose and secure inimitable results to illustrate the gifts of the nations. More significant is the success of this plan carried out in a smaller city. Lincoln's home town, now some sixty thousand, borrowed the idea and set about having demonstrations of its own.

Springfield was astonished to find that within her boundaries thirty-two nationalities were represented —such a field to draw on, such gifts as were disclosed, a community asset unrealized and unused! An Italian lawyer, a Greek physician just back from service in a training camp, a Hungarian miner, a Lithuanian priest whose childhood had been passed during the worst period of Russian persecution, a Syrian girl and a Russian boy from high school—these are some of the people who told their vivid first-hand stories. And the attendance rivaled Chicago's, there in the clubroom of the public library, itself the gift of a Scotch citizen of America, a common meeting-ground for all. What Springfield learned of her foreign-born peoples, of their contributions to her community life, is changing the point of view of her native-born citizens—wrong impressions cleared away, a false sense of superiority destroyed, friendly interest and sympathy replacing the pride and indifference of ignorance—a beginning of real Americanization!

Repeatedly the audience observed how exactly a foreigner spoke of his arrival, showing it to be a red-letter date. Not "about nine years ago," but "the twelfth of June in 1912." One man told of getting up at three in the morning to catch the very first glimpse of this land of the free of which he had heard such wonderful stories. And through the fog and mist he saw a great hand holding up a torch. A sailor explained what it was, this symbol of promise.

"That is true," the Greek went on. "America gives us success if we have ability. Ninety-five per cent. of my countrymen make good here—what chance did we have in Europe to get on in the world? More than half of us, here in your city, are in business for ourselves. But only four are American citizens. Can't you help us in this difficult business of naturalization?"

"I crossed two oceans coming to America," said a Hungarian; "the Atlantic, and that was pretty bad, in the steerage, and the ocean of English grammar, and that was worse. I tried your night school for one night. I tried the evening class at business college once. And then, with a little six-year-old next door, I taught myself. Your night school is better now, but there aren't enough classes. And why don't you teach our women?"

"Forty-five young men from my country," said another, "live in Springfield, and twenty-two of them volunteered for the war. We're here to stay. If America needs our help, we'll do our share and more. Here in Lincoln's town we wish you could make us feel more at home—'with malice toward none, with charity for all!'"—one of the frequent references to Springfield's greatest citizen, showing the foreigner's love and appreciation of his character.

"America is all that is good; no one has anything to offer us," has been our point of view. But the foreign-born has a contribution—a virility, a and endurance that bring a new energy into munity life; and not less important, an art genuine appreciation of music and painting a ature. He has, too, in many instances, an i skill in handicraft that must be utilized bef too late. Witness the story of the Florentin smith who shoveled coal in Chicago until his fingers lost their keen sense of touch and his gone; and the Belgian women who broug beautiful handmade laces to a Gifts of the class, but when questioned confessed: Yes, t their looms here, but were working in facto gradually losing their skill.

Not to blot out the foreigner's traditions a but to break down the separating barriers, t away prejudices, is the aim of the Gifts of the demonstrations. What possibilities it of preserve all the good brought to America b peoples, to discover our human resources and lish here the arts and industries whose produ have been importing, to enrich our community incorporating with our own their activities an art appreciation, and in doing this to recogni group, uniting all in love and service for Amer

This work of drawing together native-bo foreign-born, each giving, each taking, calls fo ism and devotion. But it carries its own rew the richer outlook, the deeper knowledge, the b understanding which it brings, rekindling the our own patriotism.

"This is the first time," said a Polish woma Gifts of the Nations class, "you have asked us t with you, not as foreigners, simply as Ame We've been thrown back on ourselves, we've treated as outsiders to the third and fourth g tion. If you hadn't opened the door, we'd stayed by ourselves among our own people; bu that you have opened it, we come gladly and w never go back."

The Detroit Melting-Pot

By EMMY MARY MATT

THERE is no other city in the United States so uniquely situated in one regard as Detroit. Here have been gathered within the last few years, tempted by the almost fabulous high wage scale of the motor industries and the general welfare plans of the Detroit industries for their employees, people from twenty-five or more foreign nations, and these average one-third of the city's present population.

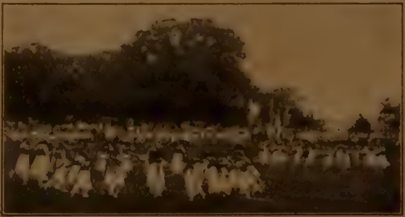
This foreign jungle, however, with its conglomerate evils, is rapidly fading away under the reconstructive or Americanization policy of the city, and such abusive appelatives as "Wop," "Dago," "Hunk," etc., are rapidly being obliterated from the vocabulary of the community.

During the winter of 1914, out of the 23,000 unemployed applying for work at the employment agency instituted by the Detroit Board of Commerce, it was discovered, with alarming concern, that 15,000 of these could not speak the American language! With this appalling army of non-English-speaking unemployed staring the Detroit employer in the face, came the realization that until this foreign populace was taught the American language, it could never be hoped to make Americans of them, and in the Americanization crusade which followed, organized by the Detroit Board of Commerce, every organization of the city was called into active service, whether its functional activities were social, civic, industrial, educational, or otherwise, and so justifiably great have been the results that a spirit of happy, contented civic pride and civic cooperation exists today in the conscious efforts of the foreign populace to espouse the high ideals and customs of America, and to learn its language.

When confronted with the query, "What are you?" proudly and promptly comes the response from the foreigner, "Me? Oh, I Americano!" and the dusky face glows with a new-born sense of civic pride and responsibility.

Many of the factories and industrial plants maintain their own individual policy of Americanization. Private night schools and recreation club rooms have been established and maintained by the industrial heads, where the American language is taught, and where American ideals are engrossed, and the welfare of the men and their families carefully guarded. Paid entertainers are employed for the men and their families at the factory club or recreation center, and the keynote of every activity there fosters the high ideals of Americanism.

The Recreation Commission operated under the auspices of the City of Detroit is doing a tremendous work in the matter of Americanization, for at the municipal recreation centers the esthetic arts and crafts of the foreign populace are carefully subserved, encouraged and guarded, which, with the peculiar folk songs and dances of each individual foreign community, may prove to be a valuable asset to the esthetic future of America.



Playground of the Detroit Recreation Commission

Another channel through which the ideals of Americanism are carried forward in Detroit is the Public Library and its branches, in the matter of providing the proper literature for these people, printed in their own languages; and there has been a large circulation of books upon civics, citizenship, and American aims and American ideals.

More than eight thousand foreign-born men and women are registered in the public night schools of the city, under Detroit's Americanization policy, three nights per week being devoted to the study of the American language and American ideals, and a fourth night, under the auspices of the Recreation Commission, devoted to wholesome recreation, the entertainment and talent for which is invariably drawn from the foreign populace thus assembled.

Previous to the year 1916 the writer, under the auspices of the Detroit Federation of Women's Clubs, was chairman of a Junior Civic System, the aim of which was to reach the parents through the little ones, instilling into the minds of the children of foreign-born parents the first rudiments or principles of Americanism, and this was operated or conducted through the channels of the public schools and the branch libraries.

This Junior Civic movement proved very successful, and whole chapters could be written about the pathetic efforts of the foreign-born parent to imbibe and adopt the doctrines of Americanism carrie the homes by the children of the Junior Civic Le

During the period of 1916-1918, however, the of the foreigner became so great, and grew to tremendous proportions, that more far-rea efforts became very necessary, and here the D Board of Commerce stepped in, and it is largely the heroic efforts of this institution that the fo born element of the city is being gradually recr and is fast losing itself in channels whose sloga watch-word is "America First!"

Hence it follows that through the foreign jun Detroit, although at first beset by fearful odds, a of fervent, patriotic Americanism is piercing, an of what once appeared to be chaotic darkness this wonderful, inspiring light of Americanism!

What was once a pathetic tragedy of foreign m tion without where to call their own, lost amid strange customs and scenes and the strange tong a strange country, has rapidly disappeared, an apparently stolid, sluggish foreigner, under Det policy of Americanization, is fast becoming a fait happy American citizen, speaking the American guage, understanding the high aims and princip American ideals, and owning an American home

LIFE is a pageant of first experiences. The first tooth, the first step, and the first spoken word are of course paramount in importance; but later come the first party, the first story book, and the first circus. And so on a maze of years.

D an editorial yesterday in a certain New k paper. It was on the subject of the German losses—a subject that we in America have known little about.

"German U-Boat losses," ran the editorial, "were rigorously concealed during the war. The Allied governments were also wary about publishing estimates of U-boat sinkings, since in the nature of the case it was difficult to establish the fact that a submarine, supposed to have been disposed of by a depth bomb, was actually destroyed. Figures which recently appeared in Berlin show that the German submarine losses were startlingly high.

"One hundred and seventy-eight U-boats were destroyed by the Allied fleets—eighty-two in the North Sea and the Atlantic, seventy-two off the coast of Flanders, sixteen in the Mediterranean Sea, five in the Black Sea and three in the Baltic. In addition fourteen were blown up by their own crews and seven ran for safety into neutral harbors, where they were interned. The immense damage done to Allied and neutral shipping in the course of the German submarine campaign could not be concealed; the world was greatly impressed by it. It would have been less impressed if the real German rate of wastage had been known. This was, of course, hidden even from the German public—perhaps from the Kaiser and some of the military leaders. But what wasn't successfully hidden was the demoralization of the personnel of the German navy, caused by the constant drafting of men for submarine work. The sailors began to look upon U-boats as submerged coffins. They rose in mutiny in the summer of 1917, and Admiral von Scheer says that his plan for an attack on the Allied fleet in the fall of 1918 was frustrated by a similar mutiny. The submarine warfare thus completely destroyed the morale of the German surface navy.

"The revelation of German losses throws a new light on the problem of the submarine's offensive value. The U-boat was a nightmare for a time——"

I MET Tim th' other day
On Broadway;
Hadn't seen him since he fell.
Covered like with streaks of blood.
In th' Argonne's battle hell.

Tim an' me was bunkies; we Marched together
Through th' water an' th' slime—
Sunny France, hey? We seen weather
That we hadn't dreamed could be Anywhere or any time.
We had fought—well, hand to hand,
Over miles o' broken land,
Through th' Vesle, an' by th' Aisne,
When th' shrapnel fell like rain—
Tim an' me was bunkies—see?

Smilin' sort o' cuss was Tim;
Never seen th' beat o' him!
He could whistle when a pack
Was like lead upon his back;
He could smile with blistered feet;
Never swore at monkey meat,
Or at cooties, or th' drill;
Always laughin'—never still—
That was Tim!

Say, th' fellers loved that boy!
Chaplain said that he "was joy
All incarnate—" Sounds all right,
But th' men said he was white,
That meant most to us, I'd say!
Why, we never seen th' day
When he wouldn't help a guy.
If he had a franc he'd buy
Chocolate or chow for us,
Gen'rus little smilin' cuss—
That was Tim!

When they got him, I can see
Even now, th' way he slipped
To th' ground beside o' me.
Red blood dripped
From his tunic an' his chin,
But he choked out, "Fellers, win!
"Me, I don't much matter!" grim.

Sure we had ter leave him lay;
War is always that-a-way;
An' we thought fer sure he'd die.
Maybe that's the reason why
We could fight th' way we did;
Why we found th' guns they hid;
Why we broke their line in two,
Whistlin' a tune he knew
All th' time we pushed 'em back,
Crowdin' on 'em whack fer whack!

I seen Tim th' other day
On Broadway;
He had lef' one arm in France,
But his eyes was all adance
When he seen me face t' face.
"Say," he shouts, "ain't this some place?
Ain't it great th' war is through?
Glad I seen it, though; ain't you?"

Smilin' sort o' little cuss,
Meetin' me without a fuss—
Tim, my bunkie, livin'! . . . Tim!
That's him!

IT WAS their boomerang of hatred that made Germany lose the world power that she coveted. It was her treatment of Belgium, her system of terrorization, her appalling atrocities that made our great—and at that time non-combatant—nation turn watchful eyes in her direction. It was her submarine warfare—treacherous, unsportsmanlike, cowardly—that made the United States send more than two million khaki-clad troops across the ocean to finish what had become a struggle between highly organized brutality and civilization. Germany threw her boomerang into the world with a curse and a challenge. With the signing of a certain treaty at Versailles, the self-same boomerang came back to Germany.

CAPTAIN JACK CRAWFORD, the poet-scout who died over a year ago, was one of my friends. Oftentimes he used to tell me of those colorful days when the United States boasted a frontier and savage tribes; oftentimes he used to sing me the songs that he had created on the lonely march and beside the guarded campfire. Some of this songs will echo in my heart for ever and ever—some of them are only pleasant, tuneful melodies.

I remember particularly one song. The exact wording has escaped me, but the gay little tune and the gay little thought back of that tune are things that I shall never forget. It was a song that he called "The Sunshine Boomerang," and it told the listener to gather sunshine and make it into a boomerang and throw it out into the lives of others—And then," finished the song, "a sunshine boomerang will come back to you!"

There's a certain little old lady that I know who has the sunshine boomerang theory figured to a science. She's a good many years past her allotted threescore and ten, and yet she's the most popular person that I know with young people. She is also loved by middle-aged folk, and her contemporaries look upon her as a wonderful leader. I remember how I commented upon her many admirers one day, and how she laughed at me.

"So many people fond of me, you say?" she chuckled. "Why, folk are no fonder of me than they are of any one else!"

"Oh, yes they are!" I insisted, "and I wish I knew your system!"

The little old lady turned suddenly serious.

"I'd hardly call it a system," she said, "because a system is something that has to be studied out and worked over. And if, as you say, people are fond of me, it has just happened so because I'm fond of them.

"Somehow I seem to like everybody. Somehow I seem to be interested in everybody's work. I want to hear about everybody's pet dream—I want to compare ideals with the young business man who lives in the apartment next to me, and I want to hear all about the charwoman's grandchild. I really want to. And I suppose people are interested in me because I am interested in them.

"I've found out, through years of experience, that the world is willing to give back to you just the degree of affection that you give to the world. It's not a system—it's something inside of the heart!"

Friends of mine, let the boomerangs that you throw into the world be sunshine boomerangs.

Have you ever gone into a crowded subway coach on a rainy day, when folk were damp and unhappy and carried dripping umbrellas? Have you ever noticed the almost certain atmosphere of depression in that coach? Of course you have!

Well, the next time you go into the subway on a rainy day, try smiling! Smile at the woman across the aisle from you, or at the small messenger boy who is leaning against the door. And then notice how the smile spreads, and how the heavy atmosphere in the coach becomes suddenly lighter and brighter. Life is often like a subway coach on a rainy day.

WHITHER GOEST THOU?

A SHORT STORY BY EDGAR WHITE

"ANSWER that question, my wise friend, and you can name your own fee!" said the old man, and his cavernous eyes glowed with an uncanny light as he turned them on the Economic Expert, Sydney Harlan, to whom he had brought the strangest problem even that man of experience had ever encountered. The expert's white face, however, showed no surprise as he meditatively repeated the question:

"How can I retain control of my money when I'm dead and gone—"

"Yes, yes!" The old man licked his dry lips.

"And know it's mine—all mine—to use just as I want to—any day—any hour," the expert went on slowly.

"That's it—it's mine—all mine, a good half million or more, gold, silver, notes and securities. There's not a discountable paper in the lot. And I want them to go on drawing interest, understand, after I'm gone—to keep on adding their cent per cent just like they do now, and going to my credit. That's the question!" croaked the old man, his excitement causing his breath to run short.

"In short, Mr. Larne, you want me to find the answer that will beat the game of life and death!"

"That's the idea—to beat the game of life and death. Ha! Ha!"

There was no mirth in the laugh, but the miser seemed to get enjoyment of a kind out of it.

"I've got a whole rogues' gallery of good-for-nothing kin," he explained; "they know I'm past 70, and they look at me with hungry, wolfish eyes every time I pass. I know what they're thinking of, the worthless drabs. And I've sworn they shall never have a cent of my money. My poor old wife died 20 years ago, and not one of them come round to help. Now, they're flitting about in the shadows waiting—waiting—say, Mr. Harlan! It will be worth ten thousand dollars to find the answer!" declared the old man rising. "Your money will be ready—tell me how to beat the game of life and death!" Again he croaked, and it sounded like the discord of a piece of machinery out of place.

"I'll think it over," returned the expert, "but I'm not saying that I will find the answer. I confess the question interests me, and I'll look into it. If I get a line that will do you any good I'll let you know."

HARLAN was a man of about 50, slender, gray-eyed, with hardly a wrinkle in his smooth shaven face. For 25 years he had been working out problems for others—solving the matter of loss in great factories and industrial enterprises, looking for the profit-leaks in railroad lines, coal mines and so on. His remarkable success had given him an almost national reputation as a business expert, and he had all the commissions he could attend to. But never before had he received one like that given him by the old miser of Fontaine Valley. Truly it was interesting. The Game of Life and Death! It had a sporting sound that appealed to the expert. He had played it himself, in a way, going through coal mines, following the tubes sunk under rivers by the tunnel builders, measuring the vibrations of sky-scraping chimneys and the like. But this was different. He would have to read up.

Harlan was the owner of a magnificent library. He shut himself in for three days, notifying his assistant that no callers were to be permitted under any condition. Copious notes were made from many writers. The expert was a man of unbiased mind in matters of faith. He belonged to no church. He was merely an intellectual machine, who devoted his brain to the service of others because he loved to think and work out puzzles upon which other men failed.

Having placed his mind upon the subject for the purpose of reaching a judicial decision, Harlan was somewhat surprised at the pitiful lack of plausibility in the doctrines of the non-believing writers. They wouldn't stand up when measured by the tape of cold logic. There was no reasonable explanation for the creation of life and matter by any of these ponderous scientists. The more he dug into them, the more incoherent they became. Some pretended to set out evidence of the spirit's return from the grave. Their claims were astounding. Their evidence—they had none. The return from the shadow land was shrouded in misty legends, superstition, conjecture.

Casting the unprofitable volumes aside, Harlan arose and paced the floor of his library, an unlighted cigar in his mouth.

"Is it possible that no man has ever solved that problem?" he muttered. "It has doubtless been asked in all ages. Here are the works of sages, wise men who have written from the beginning until now, and yet—and yet—"

"For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's, the same shall save it."

The quotation came unbidden. Though not a churchman, the expert was too well versed in affairs of life to neglect such a work as the Bible. At first thought, the quotation seemed incongruous, almost grotesque. But the question it instantly presented was, What is life?

The Book had the answer ready, clearly, without equivocation:

"Jesus said unto her, I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. And whosoever believeth in me shall never die."

"Believest thou this?"

Strange he should recall those quotations now. He hadn't read them for years. Perhaps it was natural action of his subconscious mind, which he called his "silent partner." Certainly that was getting around to the old miser's problem. It answered the questions for the same man. But would it answer for the man who made money his god?

"Whither goest thou—to heaven or hell?"

The expert's brain felt dazed at the way the questions came at him, in logical sequence, as if propounded by some severe cross-examiner in court. But as the questions came, the logical character of his mind brought the aswer. In the silent watches of the night, with nothing else to disturb him, he had opened the doors of his mind to a discussion which had continued automatically. He was unaware of any effort on his part, but as the final question—in itself the answer—came, he threw his cigar in the grate and sat down in a large chair, limp and like a man tremendously exhausted.

"Whither goest thou?" he murmured. "The whole thing is right there and I've got to answer it for myself the same as he has. In it is what we call the problem of life and death."

IN THE morning Harlan called up his client and arranged for a meeting that night. He did not answer Larne's eager question as to whether he had found his way, but said he would talk it over when he reached Larne's house. It was not Harlan's custom to take the trouble to call on his clients; he let them come to see him. But he wanted to get away from interruptions. The thing had taken complete possession of him. He was on the threshold of a new era of life.

It was a good two hours behind the time appointed when Harlan knocked at the door of the gloomy country mansion occupied by Larne and the two servants who worked about the place.

"You are late," said Larne, frowning.

"Yes," admitted Harlan; "there was a reason."

"Come in."

The two entered the large, ceiled room which in the ordinary home would be called the parlor. It was meagerly furnished, cold and lighted by a short candle which Larne carried in his hand to receive his caller.

In the semi-light of the bare room the old man's form seemed shrunken and grotesquely out of proportion.

He was attired in a large, dark wrapper, and the white, gaunt face, with the crafty black eyes, suggested an uncanny apparition.

"Have you been working on my case?" demanded the old man.

"Yes."

"Well?"

The black eyes seemed to roll with suppressed excitement, and the skeleton claws twisted nervously on the chair arms.

One who narrowly noticed the expert might have discovered that he too was laboring under some sort of excitement, but he was better trained at hiding the emotions than Larne.

"First," said Harlan, "I want to tell you of a little experience in walking from the station."

"Did you walk all the way?"

"I did. I love to take solitary strolls in quiet places, either day or night. As I entered a forest the other side of some stream I heard the report of a gun, and almost immediately afterward the agonized voice of a man: "Oh, Uncle Jacob, I didn't know it was you! I didn't know it was you!""

Larne shivered and drew his cowl closer about him.

"I hurried to the scene," Harlan went on, "and found an old man lying in the middle of the road and another man trying to lift him up. There was a gun in the road. I offered to lend a hand in raising the man, and the other, after I had convinced him that my only object was to be of service, gratefully accepted my help and we two carried the wounded man to a cabin a little way back in the forest. As I had taken a course in surgery, I immediately made an examination, and discovered the ball had entered the right shoulder, crashing through the bone, and passing out. Though painful, it was not a dangerous wound. I communicated this information to my assistant, who was overjoyed that the injury had not proved fatal.

"After dressing the wound and applying such restoratives as were at hand, the patient ca and freely talked to us. As I had apprehe man with me was the one who did the shoot had made a mistake—almost a fatal one. Hi was to kill another man."

"Did—did you learn who the other ma asked Larne, chokingly.

"I did. I'm coming to that. The man highwayman; his motive was solely reve seems the injured man, whose name was Ja well, was a sort of circuit rider among the poor of the country, a good Samaritan in word a The poor worshiped him as a messenger of G I learned from the would-be assassin. Jac was dead, and he lived alone in the little ca was a man of about 65, somewhat worn and feeble. Walking along the roadside with his might easily have been mistaken for—"

"For me," muttered the old man.

"For any man of that age and physical con remarked the expert, tactfully; "but to put and blunt, this man had mistaken the kind Jacob Doowell for the wealthy Mr. Larne. Mr. Doowell learned this he immediately b importune the man who had shot him to his feud against you, and the man with tear eyes promised that he would never harm a your head, no matter how you had wronged

"Thank God!"

"You say God?" returned the expert "Do you believe in God?"

"Why, er—I—yes, I guess I do," returned man uncertainly.

"That he's the Maker of heaven and ea all that, as the creed has it?" went on Mr. eyeing his client sharply.

"I was taught that in my early days," rep old man, musingly. "I've no reason to thi not so."

"Look here, Larne," exclaimed the expert, "Will you do what I say?"

"Why—I—what do you mean?"

"You asked me a question the other day, came out here with the answer. I'm in earnest You were close to the grave tonight! You'd think of something besides your dollars."

"I'll do as you say," Larne muttered, weakl

"Good! Now, why did that man want to k tonight?"

"Because of a difference—just a small m some money—70 or 75 dollars—not mu enough to kill a man over."

"Not much!" cried Harlan fiercely. "Di know that man and his wife came mighty near ing this winter? Did you know that 70 or 75 which you call so little would have saved the his baby? That it would have meant a prince tune to him—a happy home, comfort, health? you know you deprived him of all these thin holding it back from him? It nearly turns my cold, and I'm not used to getting excited. But here: You said you'd do as I say: Give that m money!"

"I'll do it! I'll do it!"

"Tonight?"

"Yes, tonight."

"All right. You wait here and I'll go and him."

Half an hour later, a roughly-clad, uncouth stood in the center of the big room, sobbing.

"I don't know what to say—I didn't expect Mr. Larne—you been good to me. I've don wrong, and you forgive me, and pay me more was mine—I—I—God bless you, sir."

THAT night Larne showed the expert to his in the big building; there were tears in his and his hand trembled.

"Are you richer or poorer, Mr. Larne, by night's work?" asked the guest.

"Richer! A thousand times richer!" exclaime old man. "If I had made ten thousand d today my night's rest would not be near so You have shown me the way, Mr. Harlan, but only a starter. "I see," said Harlan, quietly. "We have the an —you and I, because I am going to help in th I have money too, and was wondering what to with it. Good-night, Mr. Larne, and—er— bless you!"

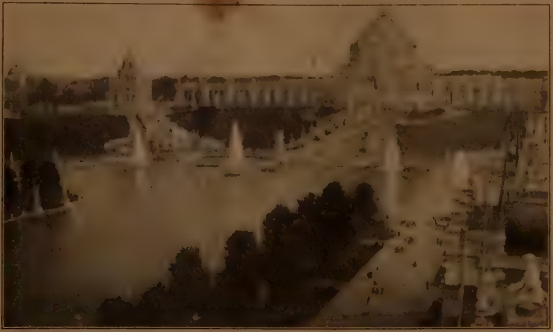
A NEW NATIONAL CAPITAL?

Proposed Removal of Government Seat to Present Center of Population



A proposed plan for a new national capitol located in the Middle West

THE Mississippi Valley region is organizing for cooperative effort. This vast domain is bounded on the east by the watersheds of the nies and on the west by the Con- Divide of the Rocky Mountains. ads from Canada to the Gulf of This valley, the richest in the contains more than one-half the ion of the United States, and in it found 70 per cent. of the farm acre- oducing 76 per cent. of the wheat per cent. of the corn. Mississippi Valley Association, a ar organization, held its first annual tion in Chicago, April 23, to consider problems of interest to the Missis- alley and to insure the cooperation ections. Although its more immedi- blems are the development of domes- foreign trade, the improvement of th and south lines of transportation, ng the waterways and the develop- f gulf ports, and good roads, various other s of great interest were included in its program her consideration.

The e of such rivalry would be to stimulate interest call the nation's attention to the fundamental which make consideration of this problem de- at the present time.

Contrary to the popular impression, Washington today is not a city composed chiefly of beautiful, commodious and artistic buildings, adequate for the needs of the government during normal times. On the contrary, there are less than ten permanent departmental buildings in Washington, most of the government activity being carried on in rented buildings. The haphazard government policy of building detached, unrelated buildings resulted in the appointment of a Congressional Commission July 1, 1916, called the Public Buildings Commission, which was requested to make a full report on the building situation, together with recommendations as to buildings needed immediately and in the future. This report was published during 1918. It states that "the government's portion of the city of Washington is destined to be almost completely rebuilt." It shows that the total cost of all government-owned buildings which have been built during the history of the national capital is approximately $63,000,000, figures for a few buildings not being available. It points out a need which existed even prior to the war for twenty-six buildings of an estimated cost of $48,000,000, to which must be added the cost of certain additional land, bringing the total to $59,000,000. Prior to the war, the government was paying over $650,000 a year rental for the use of ninety-six rented buildings. After the war started the government rented ninety-three additional buildings, for which they paid an additional rental of nearly $1,000,000 annually, the total rentals amounting to about $1,500,000 annually.

NOT only is the situation a bad one, but unless some steps are taken soon it will become steadily worse, as the government departments are bound to have an increasingly rapid growth. This is due to the insistent tendency toward a strongly centralized government. This tendency has been further emphasized by the war, as a result of which the government now regulates or controls many activities previously considered the special province of private enterprise.

The argument presented to the Mississippi Valley Association was that before this enormous expenditure was made in Washington for further permanent capital buildings, it would be well to consider the matter as a national rather than a local building problem; to determine whether Washington was so located as properly to serve the needs of a great nation for many generations, or whether the investment called for should be made in a location near the permanent center of population.

The agitation for the removal of the national capital from Washington to a more central location has come up intermittently ever since the capital was moved to Washington in 1800. Prior to that date Congress met in several different cities. From the time the Constitution was adopted until 1790, Congress met in New York. The capital was then moved to Philadelphia for the next ten years. During part of the time Congress met at Princeton, N. J., and Annapolis, Md. Congress began meeting in Washington in 1800, but in 1814 their deliberations were interrupted by the British, who sailed up the Potomac and burned the capitol building. In a few weeks Congress appointed a committee to consider the question of removal to "a place of greater security and less inconvenience." However, after a close vote the original site was retained. An agitation arose again in 1846 to move the capital to Ohio. The most important one, however, started about 1871, at which time a very strong sentiment developed in the Middle West for the removal of the capital to St. Louis.

THE growth of the United States from the Atlantic slope westward has been such as to leave Washington more or less aloof from the nation's characteristic activities and removed so great a distance from the region west of the Mississippi, and particularly the Pacific slope, as to constitute, in the opinion of many, an unjust discrimination against these rapidly expanding sections.

At the present time the boundaries of the United States have been finally determined, practically the entire Middle West has been settled, all territories have become States and the Middle West has developed enough to indicate clearly the future lines of growth and expansion, particularly as to large cities. A national capital in the Central West would tend to eliminate sectionalism, as it would be a common political meeting-ground for people from all sections.

THE SAND PILE IN KOREA IS A FOE TO THE SMALLPOX SCOURGE

IN THE old days, before modern medical science made its appearance in Korea, a Korean father in stating the number of his children never included those who had not been through the smallpox. Such children were not realities, but only uncertain possibilities.

Missionary doctors have helped to change this situation. Smallpox no longer ravages the population, and the people are learning the principles of sanitation and hygiene. These Korean babies in the sand garden at the Caroline Institute, Seoul, are robust samples of babyhood.

Will the Young People's Movement Grasp the Great Post-War Opportunity to Link Up Our Returning Heroes in the Church's Broader Field of Service and Larger Vision?

Let Us Show Them the Spirit of Sacrifice

I ANSWER this question by saying that our soldier boys as they return can be saved to the Young People's Movement and the Church, providing these Christian organizations exemplify the true ideal of service. These soldiers have been living the life of sacrifice in service and heroism. What a spectacle it was that we beheld in the whole world during the Great War! The soldiers and all the people gave of their best in the name of patriotism and for the love of country. Must we not then in the Church of today give of our best in the higher name of religion and for the love of God? See them yonder—tender women; little children, who did not merely their "bit," but who did their best and gave their all; and men—men by the tens of millions—who marched and endured and struggled and strove in mud and ice and rags and vermin and filth, many of them giving up the rich treasure of their blood on a thousand gory fields.

Here is a true story from the war: It was early morning. All along the trenches the expectant thousands were waiting the command which would send them "over the top" and across "No Man's Land" into the hell of shot and shell. With these British heroes were a detachment of Engineers whose duty it was to go over with the fighters and give attention to the guns and, as the trenches were captured, turn the captured guns against the fleeing enemy, and prepare against a counter-attack.

Among the first to go over was one of these Engineers, a Scotchman. He had no gun. He did not have to lead. His place was in the rear. But up to the top of the parapet he climbed and caught a flag from the hand of a falling soldier, and unfurled it amid the blinding sheet of flame. He stood with one hand holding the bullet-torn flag, and with the other he pointed across "No Man's Land" to the Hun lines, and with a mighty voice above the tumult he cried out, "On, Scotchmen, on! On, Scotchmen, on!" Moved by this heroism, those invincible Scotchmen went "over the top," swept across that fearful stretch of death into the enemy's lines, and miles of trenches were captured. One man had been a hero and that had inspired ten thousand more!

If our Young People's Organizations and our churches today will catch that spirit and exemplify the true ideals of sacrifice in service in their work, there will be no trouble in holding our soldiers as they return from Europe; nor will there be any difficulty in securing their splendid capacity for leadership to the Church and to the Kingdom of God, instead of having it monopolized by merely secular things.

Trained Leadership Is the Crying Need

I BELIEVE there is a great opening for the right kind of young men in the leadership of our Christian forces among young people, and that whether or not they are properly trained for this leadership is for the Church itself to decide. In my judgment, this is the weakest point in all of our Church life—training for Christian leadership.

There is no problem in connection with the Church except the problem of leadership. The right leaders once secured will solve the problems: Numerical Increase; Financial Advance; General Results. The challenge of the Church was never so strong as it is now, and the Church was never needed as it is now. The League of Nations will never succeed unless backed up by Christian sentiment. Christian sentiment is the outgrowth of deep-seated spiritual life in the Church, built upon a knowledge of God's Word.

The Church is dependent for its very life upon the young people, and particularly the Sunday school, where most decisions are made; but the young people must be trained, and the Church must train them through seminaries and other schools fitted for the purpose. There is no limit to the possibilities if we can only have a trained leadership from among our young men and women.

A FEW weeks ago the Christian Herald sent to a number of the leaders in the Young People's Movement in America letters as follows:

"Before the war it was quite generally recognized that the Church of the coming years would be molded largely by the development of the Young People's Movement. The leaders of the Church have always come in a large degree from the Sunday School, the Christian Endeavor, the Epworth League and the B. Y. P. U. Only a few came through conversion in later years.

"Now the war has come and gone. The boys are coming home. They, as well as those who stayed at home, have realized as never before the opportunity in sacrifice, the meaning of supreme devotion to a cause. In these boys who are changing back from khaki to citizen's dress there is a great mine of leadership. Will it be developed? Is the Young People's Movement able to reach out and make this leadership its own, or will these men be claimed wholly by business and politics and their capacity for spiritual leadership completely secularized?

"The Christian Herald would welcome a short statement from you on this question: 'How will the Young People's Movement Meet the Challenge of After-the-War Opportunity?' "

The answers on this page are a part of the replies. Others will be published in later issues. The editor will welcome short letters from any readers who can help to answer this immediately vital question.

Give Young Men Responsible Service

IN MY opinion, if the Young People's Societies do their duty, they will gain great strength from the boys who have joined the colors and who are coming back to their homes and their churches. My opinion is based not on my hopes and belief merely, but on some experiences which I have recently had. In the Christian Endeavor Conventions and union meetings which I have recently attended in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, and Canada, I have seen many soldier and sailor boys who have already been honorably discharged and who have taken their places loyally and heartily in the societies to which they belong. They have already been set to work, some of them elected presidents of the unions, and all of them, so far as I know, have been given a warm welcome in the societies and a place of service.

Of course only a third or less of the 200,000 enlisted Endeavorers have already returned. They have come back with new experiences, with a new horror of war, with a new love for peace and for all the better things for which the Church and the Young People's Societies stand. Others, who cared little for the concerns of the spirit before they went to the army, have been sobered and uplifted by their experiences and will join the ranks of their Christian friends. So far this has been the experience of many with whom I have been acquainted, and whom I have met in crowded union meetings.

The Young People's Societies as well as the Church, in all their departments, must do their utmost not only to welcome the returning soldiers, but to give them at once a place of responsible service in the Church work.

The Societies Must Be Revitalized

I BELIEVE the various Church organizations of young people will have to be vitalized and placed on a more virile and intelligent basis if they are to appeal to men who have seen service. The emphasis must be placed on character and on sacrificial effort rather than any particular scheme which emphasizes "personal safety." The truth behind this phrase is requisite indeed, but it has to be restated, and many of our young men and women are feeling their way to its restatement.

Must Plan with Faith and Execute Energy

ONE thing is certain; the Christian young p of America must lay their plans with l faith and execute their plans with greater ener the Young People's Movement is to meet the lenge of this new day's opportunities. At the break of our war we were told that a new day coming soon when things would be quite diff when the economic, social and religious outlo the men facing death in the conflict would oc our national thought.

That day has dawned upon us almost impercep as the early morning light usurps the sky. But actually here as truly as are our brave boys.

The new day demands a new definition of se —a definition broad enough to compass all uns service, economic, social or religious. America urge more insistently the practicability of Ch teachings and ideals as applied to business life a community life in all their relations, rather tha observance of mere ecclesiastical traditions. T ter in this would be to retard the progress o Kingdom of God.

The Young People's Movement to grasp its ent day opportunity should equip its members w broader intelligence and inspire them with a d purpose for a Christian solution of the pressing lems of this new day. For young people wisel rected are more susceptible to new ideas and responsive to the challenge of the new day.

The Church has a colossal task just ahead Its faith has reached forward to the raising of funds to meet the challenge of the new day. quite as essential as financial resources must b recruiting of a new army for Christian service to the proposed new enterprises. The needed re will inevitably come from the ranks of Chr young men and young women, as they are fired a new intelligence and a modernized purpose. one of the functions of the Young People's Move to produce these recruits, not by mere emot methods that are apt to produce disastrous rea when emotion has cooled, but by education and t ing and intelligent appeal to the will, so that a purpose may be formed and a true consecrati Christian service achieved.

The world cannot be saved by conventions, g meetings or even experience-meetings, inspirat though these may all be. Actual work counts. S service, mercy and help, reconstruction—call it you will—in a thousand forms is appealing t Young People's Movement for energetic, intelli consecrated Christian service.

"Enlarged Vision" Is the Order o the Day

FOR many years before the war, the Church been largely molded by the Young Peo Movement. I remember the year in 1880–1883 the Christian Endeavor first took hold of our y men and women and opened the doors of our chu for their activities. Until 1890 many of our saints in the church could hardly stand the inn tion. It was an opportunity thousands of y men and women had coveted and they flocke the church and came to stay. Up to 1890 the Ch had supposed the Bible school was only for chil up to sixteen years of age or less. But in 1890 Baraca movement first opened the doors of the day school to young men. People wondered they saw the multitudes of men it attracted.

Enlarged vision is the order of the day in 191 the soldiers and Red Cross workers come back new inspiration to do better work for God. Mil of our brave boys have faced death and come expecting to do God better service.

I predict the Young People's Movement will to meet this problem of the returned boys from war. No, these men from "over there" will n claimed "wholly by business and politics." T are not made of such material.

ALL INDIA HAILS THE MONSOON

Rains Have Come, Giving Promise of a Harvest, But Relief Will Be Needed Till October

GOOD news has come from India, which gives strong ground for hope that the famine may not be of long duration. Rev. R. A. Hume, now in this country on furlough, received a legram on July 22 from Chairman Hill of the ristian Herald Famine Relief Committee in India, nging the cheering intelligence that the monsoon asonable rains) had arrived, and that there would v be an opportunity to make a harvest. Dr. Hill's legram says: "Seasonable monsoon; urgent need tinued relief; harvest opportunity; inform Chris- n Herald, all concerned."

Dr. Hume, with his intimate knowledge of conditions, interprets this cablegram to an (1) that the rainy season of .9 is opening well; (2) that in te of this encouragement, the need elp is still urgent, because no one begin harvesting for three months l some not before four months; the one immediate special need o help distressed farmers to buy d for planting, in order to utilize rains to secure a harvest; (4) that clothing is an urgent need and a ge amount of surplus clôth can be ight from the Munitions Departnt at a favorable rate, it gives an eptional opportunity for clothing multitudes of poor.

Nearly 300,000,000 human beings, almost three times the population the United States, Dr. Sherwood dy tells us, live in rural India. ey are grouped in many thousands villages. The famine, which began ny months ago following the epimic, has been playing havoc with se millions of rural dwellers. Let- s from the missionaries scattered oughout the affected districts, reved by the Christian Herald dur- the last few days, indicate that crisis has been almost reached d that the fate of the multitudes India now depends on the mon- n—the rains which will mean ety and food and life for that vast pulation. All India has been praying that the rains y not fail.

Meanwhile all of the relief agencies have been work mitigating the evils of the famine as far as ssible. Missionaries have reported that great good s already been accomplished through the Christian rald Relief Fund, which has saved many of the mine-stricken people from death by starvation. Our ders will unite with us in expressing gratitude to d at being made instrumental in doing so much the people of India. This week another remitnce of $10,000 is being cabled to our Relief Comttee at Bombay, making the total remittances thus from the Christian Herald Fund $60,000.

In a letter from Rev. Charles B. Hill, chairman of e Christian Herald Relief Committee, dated Ba- Camp, India, June 11, the writer says: "The t word regarding the monsoon, the annual rainy son here, is as follows: 'The advance of the mon- is slow from the Arabian Sea, but more active from the Bay of Bengal, giving rain in Burma and at the coast stations around the head of the Bay.'" He adds that Ceylon reports that the strength of the rain-bearing currents has weakened. It was then still too early to predict with confidence concerning the monsoon.

A number of letters have been received from different parts of India stating the present famine conditions. Ven. Archdeacon Palmer, Church Missionary Society, writes from Kottayam, Travancore State, that famine conditions have prevailed there for over a year. Rice and cotton cloth are three times the price charged before the war. There is great distress everywhere. Local efforts have been made to supply rice in small quantities. The vitality of the people is greatly lowered, and there has been heavy mortality from influenza, smallpox, cholera and other diseases.

Famine victims of 1919. The whole family were stricken with the influenza, the mother died, the little fellow on the left is still frail

Rev. Judson T. Perkins, Methodist Episcopal Mission, Jagdalpur, Bastar State, writes that that section of India is now entirely in the famine area. Crops have been a failure for two years. Rice has more than trebled in price, even the poorest and cheapest. Export of food grains has been prohibited by the state. Distress prevails on every side. Several famine relief works have been opened. It is feared that conditions will be much worse before the end of September, when the early grains begin to ripen.

G. B. Ogden, American Presbyterian Mission, Kasgang, United Provinces, writes that the people this year have no feed for their oxen, which are as a rule now too weak to work and will very likely die. It has been months since the people have really had enough to eat.

Mrs. Edith H. Smith, American Mission, Ahmednagar, writes under date of June 11: "The monsoon rains have begun well near by, but here it is nearly as dry as at the end of April." She writes that cactus is now being fed to cattle. The thorns are burned off in little charcoal fires and the leaves cleaned and chopped up and mixed with cotton seed. The mixture is then eaten with a relish by the oxen, twenty-four pounds a day being fed to each. Over 18,000 cattle in this part of India are now being fed in this way, all of which would probably have died of starvation had it not been for the efforts of one man—Mr. Beyts, Collector of Ahmednagar—who taught the use of cactus as fodder.

Rev. Charles W. Posnett, Medak, Nizam's Dominions, writes of a missionary tour he recently made in the famine districts. Two villages, Aler and Karim Nagar, were scenes of great suffering. They found one man who had bought thirty starving little girls for 55 pounds sterling. He writes that the people do not sell their children in this way, except when the pinch of starvation is very real. These little girls undoubtedly will go into zenanas and be trained as heathen. Suffering was expected to continue. The poor people are regularly living on one meal a day, "not fit for cattle," consisting of any common seeds ground up and boiled into a thin porridge. Some have come down to one drink of meal-water a day as their whole subsistence. The missionaries and teachers are fighting heroically to keep the people alive, and making many sacrifices.

Mrs. Kristoffersson of the Swedish Alliance Mission writes of a Christian settlement of Bhils at Dhanora, who have no grain, nor even seed, and no money with which to buy food. Rev. J. Gass, of the American Evangelical Mission at Raipur, Central Provinces, writes that cholera is spreading in his district, due to underfeeding. Rev. H. A. Feierabend writes that in his district conditions are so dreadful that many of the people are reduced to mere skin and bones. At Vadala, a village near Ahmednagar, corn has trebled in price and other vegetables and meat are unobtainable at any price. Some are living on nuts.

Rev. Dr. Macnicol, U. F. C. Mission, Jalna, Nizam's Dominions, writes that the recent epidemic left thousands greatly weakened, and that they are less able to fight the famine hardships that now prevail. Families go wandering to distant villages in search of work, taking their children with them, and wells are completely dried up in many villages. Many distressing cases are reported by the missionaries.

Mr. M. E. Archibald, of the Canadian Baptist Mission, Chicacole, Madras Presidency, writes that the English magistrate stood for six hours in the broiling sun supervising the doling of rice to the starving poor. There was some rioting in consequence of the eagerness of these miserable people to get food.

Unanswered Prayer

TEXT -Lam. 3 : 8. "Also, when I cry, he shutteth out my prayer."

THERE is a life in man which the senses cannot comprehend, and which the physical sciences cannot weigh, mark or measure. Before all things it is personal, conscious, secret - turned toward the Invisible. Its very essence is communion with the Supreme. It is the life of prayer. As this prayer is a spiritual thing and relates only to that mystic sphere where the spirit of man holds converse with God, who is a Spirit, we cannot look for material arguments, evidences and proofs of it. But the chief ground for belief in answer to prayer is graven on the soul of man. Deeply and indelibly is written there the conviction, which neither reason nor skepticism can dislodge, that prayer is natural to the creature, and that God hears it. And then experience comes in with its testimony. And it declares that God not only can hear, but does answer, and has answered, and is answering every day the prayers that are uplifted to him from every land and soul.

Prayer especially holds a high place in the Christian religion. Our Lord prayed and taught his disciples to pray. So marked a feature was prayer of the primitive believers, that Jews and Romans spoke of them by the title: "they who call upon the name of the Lord Jesus." It was quite natural then that when the Church arranged a Christian year with themes, lessons and festivals for the various Sundays, one should have been set apart, called "Prayer Sunday." Assuredly there can be no more beautiful scene than for Christians of all lands and churches to be uniting on one Sunday in intercession to our common God and Father. And will not Jehovah thereby be moved to fulfil his promise: "And there I will meet with thee and commune with thee from above the mercy-seat"?

Let us look at just one phase of this precious theme, viz., unanswered prayer. How are we to reconcile with this Christian belief and teaching as to prayer the number of prayers that are continually offered, and from all that we can see are offered in vain? The cry goes up, but the ear of the Father seems closed as though he did not hear. The heavens seem but brass to the ascending supplication. How many Christians are presenting petitions for some personal object, for which they plead and plead, and still their plea is not granted!

A partial solution of this difficulty is to be found in this: that men forget that prayer is more than a privilege; it is a law. Just as God has instituted certain laws by which he operates in the realm of nature, so he works by certain laws in his spiritual kingdom. And as in nature definite results are dependent upon the observance of certain divinely established laws, even so in the realm of grace God has ordained that certain results can be produced alone by the observance of certain fixed laws or conditions. And as a scientist who would disregard natural laws would fail in his experiments, just so if we disregard the spiritual laws conditioning prayer, we cannot expect to have it answered.

WHAT are some of these mistakes, errors and misapprehensions which largely account for what are called unanswered prayers? One cause is the selfishness of too many prayers. Prayer was never meant to be all petition, all asking, all seeking, all getting. In fact, the prime purpose of prayer should be just the opposite - gratitude. Our hearts should move us to prayer to give glory to God, to praise him for his perfections, to give thanks for his loving-kindnesses, and to recount his beneficent providence. And where men forget this supreme object in prayer, and think only of themselves, and have it as a means of getting something they want, their method is radically defective. And this selfishness is shown, too, in asking only for material things. Reverently we may say that God does not like a beggarly attitude in prayer—a seeking earthly good gifts.

True prayer is a longing for divine communion. It is the soul in its better hours, in its loftier moods, pouring forth its most ardent love, its deepest and sweetest penitence, its highest hopes and aspirations, to the ear of its divine Friend. As some pupil looks admiringly into the face of his noble teacher, or as some child approaches an affectionate father or mother, so the spirit addresses its deepest thoughts and finest feelings to Him who is kinder than the kindest, nobler than the noblest, friendlier than the friendliest.

Love is the true motive spring of prayer. As run Coleridge's lines:

> "He prayeth best who loveth best > All things both great and small."

And as Whittier sings:

> "To worship rightly is to love each other;
> Each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer."

This is true prayer where it is worshipful and spiritual instead of being merely material, and where it is an unselfish pleading for the bodies and souls of others. Such a worshiper will not fail of blessed and glorious answer, as he who prays otherwise is too apt to fail.

Another cause of unanswered prayer arises from a misunderstanding as to how God answers prayer. The promise of God is not always that he will answer our petitions by removing particular evils or by granting specific requests, but that he will give us the grace and strength to meet the emergency and to endure and overcome the trial. This is the meaning of that passage: "But God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above what ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way of escape, that ye may be able to bear it." That is: prayer was not meant always to take away trial or its pain, any more than a sense of duty in waiting upon the takes away the danger of infection, but it pres the strength of the whole spiritual fibre, so that w bear the trial without falling into desponden sin. A sorrow comes upon you. Omit prayer, you fall out of God's proving into the tempta of Satan: you get angry, hard of heart and rest but meet the dreadful hour with prayer, cast care upon God, claim him as your Father, though he seem pitiless, and then the embitte effects of pain and sorrow pass away, and a str of strengthening and softening grace pours into soul. Were we to go upon our knees with this and purpose when in temptation or trouble, t would not be nearly so many complaints of unansw prayers.

This was Solomon's idea and use of prayer, a tells us: "The name of the Lord is a strong tower; righteous runneth into it, and is safe." That i danger and trial he simply cast himself with all might upon the Lord, and this made him calm strong to meet the trouble.

ANOTHER cause of ineffectual prayer is fal away from God. Some people, when in straits, pray when they have never before com God, for irreligious people are by no means with occasions when they pray. And some again would like to give up the habit of prayer, even when have quite given up Bible, church and religion. T pray, and yet is not such prayer very hollow? was the case with a notable prayer of King S He had by no means openly relapsed, still less he fallen into immorality or vice. But he had fa from the life of faith and obedience and commu with God. And what was the result? "And w Saul inquired of the Lord the Lord answered not, neither by dreams, nor by visions, nor prophets."

Our unanswered prayers are chiefly the fault of low spiritual state. To live in worldliness, relig apathy and sin, and then seek an audience God, is well-nigh akin to sacrilege.

The great preacher Spurgeon declared that never had an unanswered prayer. But why? lived and worked in the very presence of God. prayed with a child's simplicity, and with a chi unquestioning faith. And such a life and such a pr God could not but respect and hear. To put a our sins, to overcome evil tempers and to walk Christ in daily fellowship of spirit are necessary have power with God, and to prevail with the mighty and to make us sure of never offering an i fectual prayer.

Yet another explanation of unanswered praye to be found in our Lord's reply to Salome when came worshiping him and desiring a certain g favor of him for her sons James and John. Here w all the conditions of successful prayer. Salome followed Jesus from Galilee, and was to prove

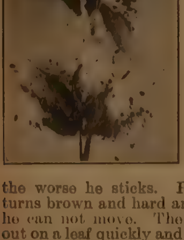
THE AIRSHIP PLANT—A Sermon for Boys and Girls



HERE is an airship plant. If you are in the country in the summer you will see it, for there are many of them almost everywhere. You will see it with purple blossoms, fifteen or twenty on a stem. To keep alien enemies away from its ships while they are being built it has a milky glue that oozes out of it when an ant, for instance, starts to crawl up. This white sticky stuff clogs the ant's feet. The more the ant struggles, the worse he sticks. Pretty soon the milky paste turns brown and hard and then the ant is done for—he can not move. The ant's only hope is to crawl out on a leaf quickly and drop to the ground. To build its airships this milkweed must have some wee parts from other airship plants. Watch its trick. It has honey. That will bring bees and wasps and butterflies. It has slippery cracks. While the bee or wasp or caterpillar is sipping the honey its foot slips into the crack; but it won't come out. It slides along to the end where there is a brown cross-piece. The bee or wasp or butterfly gives a hard jerk to get loose, jerks off the brown cross-piece which hangs on its foot and twists around like a pair of saddle bags, and when the bee or wasp or caterpillar lights on the next milkweed flower, these saddlebags catch in its crack and leave there the wee parts which that other airship plant must have.

THIS sermonette or Short Talk for Young Folks is written by Rev. S. Edward Young, D. D., pastor of the Bedford Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. It is recommended for use in the homes of our Christian Herald Family Circle, Sunday evenings. Dr. Young is widely known as a preacher of remarkable ability and as a Christian reformer.

On October days the airships are ready for launching—fifty or more of them in one of these drydo sometimes ten drydocks on a stem—five hun airships, each one having fifty or more silky sail away they sail! Who is in the passenger car of airship? Oh, that is baby milkweed, sailing of start another airship plant next year. He will have a long winter's sleep and then build five hun airships of his own. The airship plant says two th to us. The first is—Use God's helps. The reason milkweed grows everywhere is that it uses what offers for its help—the milk glue, the bees, wa and butterflies, the breeze that bears its airships How God offers us helps to grow like him— Bible, the Church, the Sunday school, good pare and friends—yes, His own hands reach down guide and lift. . . . Use these.

The second thing the airship plant says is: Th of God's wonders around you. Can any of our sl building plants show anything so wonder Then why doubt that God can do the great wonders? Why doubt that, if you will trust h he can take you away when you die, to voy onward, onward, onward, into the harbor of e less joy?

The New Era Opportunity

A NEW crusade has been originated by Dr. John Clifford, the distinguished leader of the Baptist Church in England, and favorably known in this country as one of the ablest of preachers, with views far broader than denominational lines. He lays down as a foundation truth the principle that, however far Christians may be from exemplifying in their own lives the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount, the spirit of that "Constitutional Code of the Kingdom of Heaven" is hidden somewhere away back in the consciousness of every one of us. For this reason he regards it as a fitting time to form a League of Religions, in order that all may work together as one, to preserve peace on earth. That Christian believers may prepare for this duty, he urges that immediately after the League of Nations is completely established and has begun its task, the broader League should be formed, as an effective bulwark of the other.

Dr. Clifford's proposition will be regarded by many as opportune. Men and governments have utterly failed in the past to assure peace, chiefly because they left God out of the reckoning. No man-made edict can change human nature or eliminate its weaknesses. Dr. Clifford's argument is that what man alone cannot accomplish, he can do working together with God. This unity of the human with the divine purpose he indicates as the great task toward which the Church of Christ should now strive. He holds it to be the grandest opportunity that could be presented for bringing the Gospel so close to the hearts of men of every nation that light will break in upon them, and they will work and live and pray, as never before, to bring lasting peace.

It is a noble setting for a great thought, and we shall see whether, in view of all that is at stake, the Church will be disposed to listen. No one desires to see the Church on the defensive. Why should it be necessary? We prefer to see her rising aggressively to her work, assuming the duties and privileges that are hers by right, and authoritatively claiming what is indisputably her own—the spiritual leadership of the world. There are doubtless many who believe with Dr. Clifford that the time has come when the Church must cease to be a spectator and become a doer of deeds. It is not a surprising coincidence that other forthreaching minds, comprehending the situation, should take a view very much in line with that of Dr. Clifford. Archbishop Benson, a distinguished Episcopalian, emphasizes this in these words concerning the denominational attitude toward unity: "At present we agree—God be praised!—in more things than we know. Surely a sound hope of unity lies in urging all men to seek and find what are realities; even when we can see no step near, let us keep our face longingly right ahead toward the light." Another writer of authority, Edwin A. McAlpine, D. D., president of the College Board of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., in a volume just issued, entitled "On to Christ," declares that the Church must preach the Gospel of the new era; that the Church can reach the goal far more surely by eliminating denominational rivalry than in any other way. "The Golden Moment of the age has come. Let the Church lay aside the everyday prejudice and the sin of selfishness and run with patience this race that is before her. . . . Christ is the life of the Church, and her fundamental purpose is to be Christ's alone to the world. . . . Christ gives us the only principle on which to build the Church, instead of quarrels and theological heart-burnings. It gives us the oneness of appeal which opens the doors to the opportunity of a new era."

The rallying cry must now be not "Back to Christ," but "Forward with Christ"; the doctrine; Love to God and to our fellow man, than which there is "no greater commandment."

A Road of Remembrance

THE American Forestry Association had a happy idea when it suggested that trees should be planted along the city streets and country highways in memory of the soldiers who died in France, and as a tribute to the victors who had come home. It suggested that the roads thus shaded should be called "roads of remembrance," and it is hoped that more than one highway from coast to coast may be shaded, twenty years from now, by great trees which this generation has planted in memory of its heroic sons. The young trees will be eloquent witnesses of the new life of the world which has sprung out of the peace settlement, and we may perhaps be permitted to hope that the world will grow toward real peace as rapidly as these trees grow toward maturity. A tree on the roadside is a friend of man or beast a shelter from the rain and sun, and a protection both for the road and the traveler. Shaded roads are not only more comfortable to travelers, but last longer than those exposed to the sun. Trees planted along the roads this year will soon have multiplied themselves, and there will be many little pieces of woodland twenty years from now in places which are today only waste corners of stones and weeds. And every traveler who gains comfort or protection under the spreading branches along the "road of remembrance" will recall the sacrifice, the victory, the triumph of liberty, and pledge himself anew to the cause of human justice and of right between man and man.

A Unique Spiritual Campaign

AMONG the many stories that come to us from the front one tells of an athletic chaplain who is a skilful wrestler. While in Germany with the Second American Division he conducted a novel "Go-to-Church" campaign among the soldiers with remarkable results. Finding the men favorable to athletics he held every evening a wrestling contest, the conditions of which were that if the chaplain, who was the challenger, should win, the defeated soldier would come to church and induce five others to keep him company the next Sunday. In seventy-five per cent. of the matches the chaplain threw his man, and the battalion saw to it that the terms of the contest were scrupulously carried out. The "Wrestling Parson," as he was dubbed, was voted a huge success. Unfortunately the record does not show if any spiritual transformation followed; but let us hope that many who were flung on the mat by the chaplain will keep up the habit of church-going so persuasively begun. The strong-armed wrestler has his counterpart. We remember Bishop William Taylor, the great American missionary to Africa, a man of magnificent physique and a giant in strength. He appointed as one of his missionaries to the Congo a young athletic Virginian, whose station was at a central point where several native tribes joined territories. The chief and his warriors looked sharply at the sturdy, lithe-limbed Virginian. Soon a delegation waited upon him and invited him to join in a celebration they had planned by way of welcome. They also bore a challenge from the greatest wrestler among their tribes. Advised by a few of the older missionaries, the Virginian did not decline the invitation. When the festive day came he faced a powerful native who was greater in weight and girth than himself. After a little experimental byplay that he might get a line on the native tactics, the young missionary put forth all his skill and strength and flung his rival, not once but three times. After that, his little chapel was crowded at every service.

"Did he do right?" some will doubtless ask. Well, we frankly answer, we don't know. Paul knew the thrill of the arena, for he had "fought with beasts at Ephesus." Later, he had battles to fight for the truth. Do not let us be over-zealous in judging or condemning methods which we ourselves may never employ. If the supple-limbed parson of the Second Division wrestled for the glory of God and the success of his missionary church, he deserved credit for his strenuous efforts, even if he chose a novel way to add to his congregation.

Cheerful Christianity

THERE was a time when the most deeply pious walked the earth like living embodiments of woe. They feared God, which was well, but with faces shadowed by its forecast, they wanted all to flee from the wrath to come. They had their eye on the thundercloud of God's displeasure, instead of on the rainbow pledge of his promise, the sunrise of his salvation.

The Scriptures call us to repentance, to godly sorrow for sins, but they call us even more to joy in the Lord and to rejoicing in his salvation. Christians should be the most joyous people on earth. They are freed from the guilt of sin, all their shortcomings and mistakes are forgiven and forgotten, and they are commissioned as bearers of the happiest message ever told to men. In a large measure this is the case. Get into a group of missionaries or ministers, or even plain deacons, and you will find a happy crowd; you will hear some good stories told in kindly humor, interspersed with tales of Christian conquest, of sorrow lightened, of sinners set leaping for joy. The love of Christ is a fire that warms the heart and that glows in the eye. Any clean fun is consistent with the Christian profession, whether it is golf or tennis, or boating or driving, or just picnicking. The sp of Christ in the life will add to the pleasure of p together with the joy of a clear conscience and a p purpose. Chase away the glooms! They don't bel in Church or churchmen.

Rains Bring Hope to India

ALL India has been praying for rain. Now, w the coming of the belated monsoon, h arrives that the famine which has held milli in its grasp for months past may soon give way better conditions. This is the best of good news will be welcomed by the readers of the Christ Herald and all who have heartily united with th in fighting the famine. These efforts, the missi aries assure us, have been the means of saving m lives. We are glad to have been the channel throu which so much good has been accomplished. It m appear to some a trifling matter to give a few doll to such a cause in a time of crisis; but the real va of the gifts can be better understood by those who r the wonderful letters of the missionaries who h walked in the midst of death and suffering, through the practical sympathy of our friends w sent their offerings to the Christian Herald Fam Fund, have won back thousands to life and hope w must otherwise have perished.

Up to date the Fund has cabled $60,000 to f the famine stricken. Should the rains be plenti a crop will be harvested within three months and grave danger will have passed. Meanwhile we m continue to help the missionaries, and thus compl the life-saving work so splendidly begun.

Tipping

MANY times has the announcement been ma that the tipping custom was on its last le and must soon depart. But it has stayed o and its very persistency seemed to indicate that had at least some redeeming quality. A steady hot and restaurant diner of fixed habits likes the sa chair at which he has sat every day for years at t same hour. He patronizes the same waiter—"m attendant" he learns to call him. And the latt like many of his class, if he be clever, can make hi self well-nigh indispensable. He knows the me and its changes; he can indicate in a helpful way t juiciest meats and the most appetizing dishes t kitchen affords. He studies the tastes and preferenc of his patrons, as a tactful waiter knows how to d and this the experienced diner values even more th the service of the meal itself.

But the old fashion of tipping the waiter is soon give place to a new order of service. Hotels, resta rants, pastry-shops and tea-rooms are moving for th introduction of a new system, under which the wait will receive a 10 per cent. bonus on the amount of th diner's check, in lieu of tips left on the table or hande to him, according to present custom. While this wi be an economy in many cases to the patron, it claimed that it will be more satisfactory to the ma agement and a more reliable source of income to th waiter. In certain clubs in Chicago and a few othe cities, the management bears half the cost of servic the other half being added to the patron's check, an both credited to the waiter. One large associatio with many thousands of waiters and head-waiter among its members, is advocating the adoption of th new 10 per cent. service charge, and other organiza tions are now taking up the proposition. The old fashioned tip seems bound soon to be superseded No longer will the waiter feel that he is placed in semi-mendicant attitude; he will now be able to tak his service allowance not as a gift, but as somethin he has fully earned. And he will feel that, with th passing of the tip, a feature which many times ha been felt to be degrading has gone forever.

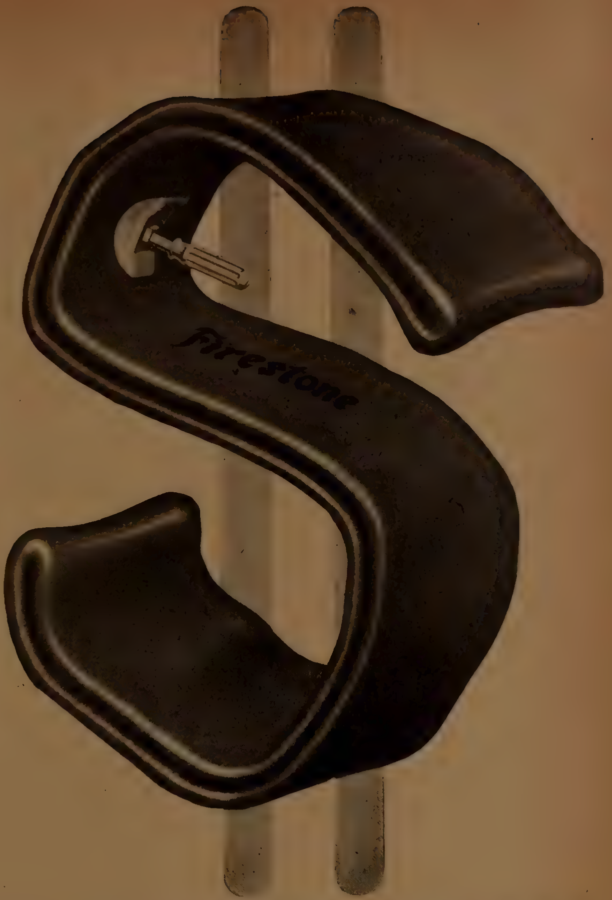
—the Inside of the Mileage Story



YOU naturally accept the fact that tubes form a big part of the expense of traveling in motor cars. And you don't need to be reminded that inner tubes cause most of the delay and bother on the road. Some car owners, however, still need reminding that Firestone men take the tube question just as seriously as they do the tire question, and are as firm in their determination to deliver most miles per dollar in tubes as in tires

As a matter of fact it is easier for you to see, feel and measure the finer qualities of Firestone Tubes than it is for you to appreciate the extraordinary values in Firestone Tires. Compare tubes over the counter. The quality of rubber in a Firestone, the greater quantity of it making a thick wall the "feel" and texture of the tube, the appearance of the workmanship—all speak for greater value.

Put such a tube inside of your casing and you cannot help having greater confidence in the behavior of your tires. The tube is going to do more than give you its own long service; it is going to make the tire serve longer and better. The best evidence we know of the great service given by the Firestone Red Tube is the fact that it is used so largely in Giant Pneumatic Truck Tires. If it is best for that extra hard service, it certainly is best for the ordinary wear of passenger cars.

The Firestone Red Tube, made by the Firestone process of antimony cure, means the most dense and toughest wall of rubber that has yet been devised. With layer on layer of this rubber, built up by the laminating method to unusual thickness and welded into one sturdy, elastic wall, we have a tube that resists most friction and heat and all the tests of service for the longest time.

This is why we say the tube represents the inside of the mileage story. You can't see it in service, you can't watch its performance. For that very reason you want a tube in which you can place your fullest trust.

Remember the Firestone creed—to deliver most miles per dollar—applies as well when you are buying tubes as when you are buying tires.
Your dealer will supply you.

RELIGION AND THE CHILD

By MARGARET W. HEALD

A·B·C·D·E·F
CLARK

MY TWO-year-old boy and I go to church every Sunday, rain or shine, a devoted father said at a large assemblage of earnest Sunday-school workers not long ago. This statement provoked rather a long series of comment from the friends present. A reason for this rather exceptional practice was requested, to which the innovator replied: We all agree that imitation is the ruling factor in a child's education. We recognize this instinct is universal, not a result of environment, or inheritance, or the special privilege of any class or nation. Professor Preyer says, when a child begins to imitate his surroundings that moment his will is born. Why not seize that moment and take the child to church? Religion is a part of a child's education; why not proceed upon an accepted path and cooperate with his other branches of instruction?

We plan our Sunday morning walk, my two-year-old boy and I, that we shall be passing a church as the last bells are tolling. We just naturally walked in, the first time without a word of comment on my part, but a little later by the expressed insistence of the boy. We walked in; I removed my hat; he did the same; we sat down in a rear seat and I knelt in silent prayer. The boy did not imitate this act until about the third Sunday, and then entirely of his own volition. We remain in the church through the first hymn. We then proceed with our walk through a nearby park. There is no education in the big meaning of that experience which is not dominated by that greatest teacher of them all, Dame Nature. Her school books are the fields and woods and the sky. "From her the child should learn its cradle hymn of whispering breezes, its nursery song of running brooks, its childhood chants from the throat of bird and hum of bees, in order that maturer life may catch the grander, fuller harmonies, which can come only to well-developed, reverent natures, who are ready to worship God in truth."

FOLLOWING in the footsteps of the master child-educator we walk until we arrive at a flagstaff upon the tip of which is perched a weather-vane. Without any suggestion on my part we observe all things the wind is busy about on a spring morning. We see here the fact that imitation is also a search for causes and "the first school of the soul is the school of astonishment and that the beginning of knowledge is wonder and the path to paradise is upon the ascending rounds of the stairway of surprise." This is the place where we put in practice the child educator's phrase, "follow your children" or in other words let the child talk; it's the parent's task to answer questions, if he can, because it is said "that every premature definition of a virtue is the seed of a vice."

An unseen power is expressed in this lively moving thing, a second psychological moment has arrived in our religious training. We imitate with our hands this lovely pointing sprite turning first this way and that. The boy and I turn our hands, held stiff upon our wrists, like the weather-vane turns upon the rod, while we sing this little song:

"This way, that way, turns the weather-vane;
This way, that way, turns and turns again:
Turning, pointing, ever showing
How the merry wind is blowing."

LET us relive for a moment our childhood, how we met the mystery of wind, storm, lightning, and thunder. Many of us have not yet lived down a sense of fear. We can readily recall the running into a darkened room, those caring for us suppressing sobs and groans at the intensity of thunder and wind. The little child uninjured by ignorant companionship feels only wonder at the furious storm, and an unconscious desire to know the cause. This wonder at an unseen power and the imitation to understand its cause is an intellectual crisis and the moment of spiritual unfolding in the infant mind.

For a year this weekly lesson has been practiced, continued the parent; the result would warrant my earnest appeal to all parents to venture the experience. We varied our arrival at church after some weeks by getting there before the church hour for service; on those occasions we made a pilgrimage from window to window; we observed the church furniture, the pulpit, the choir stalls, and talked them over often and at length. The beautiful windows were explained in their many relations as to colors and meaning. The color idea was carried into other things we saw in the park in the spring—the flowers, the birds, and butterflies. The success of this method to teach religion is in the silence practiced by the parent. Never ask the questions, "Do you like to go to church?" or "How does the wind make you feel?" or "Where do you suppose the wind comes from?" The only success lies in letting the child wonder "without contemplating wonder." We must not disturb the unconscious thinker. "Rend not with profane hands the veil which shrouds that holy of holies, a human soul." We must not forget that symbols are the "safeguards of mystery," and that with them ever present to the child's mind, embody both "concealment and revelation." When the child asks "What makes the wind blow?" do not answer but point to another mystery, "What makes your hand move when you play the weather-vane?" replies the wise parent.

In these two most simple acts, going silently into a church, watching the wind turn a weather-vane and reliving the experiences in innocent play, can be seen the child's attempt to find the invisible cause back of the visible objects; this is the opportunity to teach the great lesson that behind all life there is a great Invisible Power. "Science may call it Force; Art may call it Harmony; Philosophy may call it World Order; many religions have called it God, but Christianity calls it 'Our Father.'"

THE problem before all parents is how to teach the children that the unseen things are as real as the seen things all around him. First of all the parent must feel it himself. The bowed head at the table, a folding of hands at bedtime and kneeling beside the child in prayer with all the world shut out, is the great power of example that carries a message way beyond the spoken word. The sacred music in the church, the subdued light, the whisper voices, all inspire the inner religious latent in the child's heart.

"When and where does this reverent f ing begin?" ask the listeners. "It is wit as with the germs of plants and seeds in spring; they are there long before they outwardly visible. So we do not kn when or where this development commen in the human being."

We do know positively that, like the pla if it is not fostered and nourished it d not grow. The people who do not go church testify to that fact. The indifferen to human wrongs and suffering proves over again.

Your Table in Summer

By LAURA A. KIRKMAN

DURING the warm weather the thoug ful housewife makes an effort to ha her table as suggestive of coolness as possib She realizes that flowers or a potted fern ha the effect of making the diner forget h warm he is; and that little dishes of radish mint, or cress with the beads of water still it, make the meal more tempting.

Iced water or fruit juices, too, add to t desired effect of coolness, as well as sala chilled on ice and served with an abundan of lettuce. To be sure, ice cream, wat ices and parfaits give a crowning touch coolness to the summer meal, but as it not practicable to serve these daily t clever housewife chooses as desserts or puddings which are meant to be served cold, chilli them in the ice box before the dinner hour.

Cold meats, sliced thinly, are particularly tempti on warm days, and jellied meats are almost indispe sable at a guest meal—when, naturally, the housekeep spares herself no pains to achieve an effect of "ve special" deliciousness and daintiness. The followi recipe for jellied ham may be used to make a mold other meats, as well as ham.

Mold of Ham: Slice thin, shapely pieces from a co cooked ham. Chop scraps of the ham which may n be sliced. Soak 1 box of gelatine in a half-cupful cold water, then dissolve it in 5 cupfuls of boiling sou stock. (If you have no meat stock, dissolved be cubes may be used.) Season with ½ teaspoonful salt, a pinch of pepper, and 2 teaspoonfuls of lem juice or tarragon vinegar. Allow a layer of pu strained jelly to stiffen slightly before adding th chopped meat and filling the mold. Serve either as meat dish on lettuce leaves, or as a salad course co ered with mayonnaise dressing.

"I HAVE thrown away my hassocks," I once heard woman say. "They aren't fashionable any longer The hassocks referred to had long been a part of th living room furniture in this woman's home. H aged father still enjoyed using them. Why, then, ha she thrown them away?

Surely not to be "fashionable." For, among tho who know, comfort is the most important aim of th furnishings and decoration of a living room. An thing which is comfortable is fashionable. Just a cheer is the accepted keynote of the ideal dinin room, so comfort is the accepted aim of a living room.

Deep, roomy chairs, a generous sofa, a table-lam foot rests—these things are a part of the ideal livin room.

But perhaps the thing which contributes most to th comfort of a living room is the wall paper. Althoug we do not realize it, the color of our walls has a decided effect upon our nerves, and is either soothing i its influence or irritating.

In choosing wall paper for a living room, one shoul be guided by the exposure of the room. Rooms facin south or west should be papered in fairly dark color to offset the glare of the sun; rooms facing north an east should have wall paper of a lighter color—a though not too light, because of a glare which artificia light would produce at night. Subdued walls ar restful to the eyes and should be the choice for thi room which is used so constantly in family life.

Kenilworth and Winnetka didn't have to consider first cost — but they were vitally interested in last cost. When you consider cost, let it be ultimate cost only. Christian Missions

Matt. 28:18-20; Acts 1:8; Acts 13:1; 14:28

Aims, Methods and Results

By Rev. George D. Allison,, Ph.D.

THE chief aim of Christianity, after that of the saving of souls, is to establish the Kingdom of God in the world, the order of brotherliness, righteousness and holiness which Jesus proclaimed among men, The chief method is by making known his matchless personality and his gospel message, that he may be accepted and followed by all peoples. The chief instrumentality, under God, is the visible Christian Church. It is, first of all a missionary movement, a force in the hands of God for individual and social regeneration at home and abroad. It must produce ever-increasing numbers of Christlike men and women; it must redeem from sin and futility the lives of its children and youth, and it must also drive out entrenched evils in society and the state. Foreign missions and home missions are essentially one.

The New Testament is fundamentally a book of missionary effort, first by the Master and then by his disciples, whom he commissioned as "apostles," men sent on a mission. Presumptuous indeed are those who would eliminate the third section of the Lord's instructions to his Church, professing that they "don't believe in" foreign missions. They also forget that "foreign missions" brought us our Christian faith.

As early as in Matthew 4:23 one can find laid down the chief methods used by the Saviour himself and followed even until this day in all our work at home and abroad: "Jesus went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the good tidings of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people."

Preaching we usually put first as the method of work. Rightly understood, all else falls under this general head. The power of God through the spoken message has never failed to move the hearts of men.

Teaching is even put ahead of preaching by Matthew in the text quoted. Jesus was above all else a teacher, patient, wise, transforming, suggestive, inescapable in his reasonings. Paul followed him in that Corinthian letter where he disclaims oratorical pretense, and then goes on with chapter after chapter of earnest, thoughtful instruction. Superstition is based largely on ignorance. New converts are entitled to read the Word of God for themselves and to gain in usefulness by its mastery. This means schools, elementary and grammar. Leaders must be raised up. That means academies and colleges. Presses must be set up, edifices to house school and church erected, the people helped out of idleness and filth. That means industrial training, sanitation, instruction.

Healing is so important as to deserve a coordinate place with evangelism and teaching. "Time would fail" to tell of the manifold and Christlike ministry of the medical missionary.

We all know how effective the New Testament missionary campaign proved to be. The modern period with its great revival of interest dates back to Carey, only 127 years ago. In this brief time the heathen world has been explored, surveyed and strategically occupied. In China, India and Africa a native church has een developed and firmly established. Increasingly this church is self-propagating.

The reflex of modern missions has awakened the Church at home to new loyalty and appreciation of its treasures in Christ, acting like a spiritual tonic throughout every denomination.

What a United Church Might Achieve

CAN Protestantism unite? Not theoretically or sentimentally unite, but organically and really unite? To be one by a unity like the kind indorsed at that recent Philadelphia Convention, attended by most of the leading denominations. It is claimed that a spiritual fellowship already exists and that an organized unity cannot in any way contribute to its significance or force; yet the fact remains that an apparent curtailment of influence among the churches confronts the student of ecclesiastical history and present conditions as he reviews the attitude of the denominationalism of today. Churches do not live for self-advertising or even self-perpetuation. They are to be a "quid pro quo" in the great drama of life, that they may prepare all people for both an earthly and a heavenly citizenship. Does the increasing rage of rivalry enhance the evangelistic spirit? Are the great fundamental doctrines of Holy Writ brought into the forefront of religious thought rather than many extraneous and incidental matters?

The organized union of Protestantism is required for the triumph of democracy in the church; "Vox populi vox Dei." What political partisanship does in the hindrance of great reforms, sectarianism accomplishes in another field. And so they are closely akin. But the organic union of Protestantism is not an Utopian scheme or an iridescent dream. Great and far-reaching Christian reforms call and call loudly for such a union. The speedy evangelization of the world will be hastened by it. Petty local rivalries will be set aside before the light and splendor of great moral issues in both church and state. And believers without denominational names will present an inspiring battle front, an unbroken firing line for such radical, aggressive measures. They will not wait for others to open and pioneer the way to civic righteousness.

Baby's First Two Terrible Years

A baby has no control over its early habits — no power of self-protection. It is perfectly helpless against an endless siege of irritation.

Baby skin. a skin flower-soft and delicate as silk, is scalded most of the time. These scalds are chafed into a painful rash by the curiously uncomfortable garments which encase chubby legs.

Teething rash — always distressing—adds its bit of suffering.

There is wonderful relief for baby in Mennen Kora-Konia.

Dust Kora-Konia on the raw, inflamed skin. See how quickly the sores dry up and the redness turns to a healthy pink — how the pain goes and lets the baby sleep — or smile.

Kora-Konia soothes and heals. It contains several ingredients of recognized medicinal value and resists all moisture. It is antiseptic, absorbent, and lubricating; and it stays put, giving lasting relief.

Kora-Konia is a blessing to grown-ups as well. It relieves chafing, burns and skin irritations.

The Winner of the Contest

IS not everybody that can win a ousand dollars in a contest with arly 50,000 quick-thinking Amer- citizens. When we found, there- hat Sidney Smith, of Philadelphia, on by a very high percentage over her contestants the first prize of 0 in the Third Bible Picture we knew that every subscriber e Christian Herald would want ow something about Sidney Smith ow he did it. Mr. Smith is a good er, but he makes no claims to liter- erit. He found it a very difficult to write out for us the story of ng siege with the baffling pictures the anything but accommodating es.

nce we did not wish to entrust the ery of this important check to the one of the editors of the Christian ld went to Philadelphia and de- ed the check in person. He got t North Philadelphia, and took a across Kensington to the block oral Street where Sidney Smith ucts a clean and up-to-date shop thriving new neighborhood. It was pical Philadelphia neighborhood—lestone pavement, red brick fronts, trees along the curb and carefully bbed front steps. Many of the le work in the stocking factories h have replaced the one-time ishing ingrain carpet mills. Girls used to earn $7 and $8 a week are making $25 on part time. Every- in Kensington is prosperous.

e editor stood by and watched le Sidney Smith waited on a steady um of boys, girls and mothers who the screen door of his shop banging, le the cash register sang a merry . It is a cash business with no time for worry. That may be one reason Sidney Smith found time to couple right verses with those 30 pictures. editor was much pleased as he ned the door of Mr. Smith's store ee a sign which read "Closed On day." He thought that argued well a winner of a Bible contest. He was ally pleased with Sidney's mother, keeps house for him in the little ms back of the shop. A good mother eason enough for a good man.

was some time after he entered re he was able to state his errand. Smith had not been expecting to an editor. He was a little bit taken ck at first, and then he bethought self of his friend William Beuerle, h whom he had worked on the con- , a conductor on the traction line, was fortunately at home for his ch hour. Beuerle was equally sur- ed to see an editor of the Christian ald. He talked in glittering general- s for a while in an evident effort to asure up to the occasion. Then he ke out: "Say, I always thought gious editors were gray-haired old n who wore black coats and talked us; but you're a regular fellow." er that restraint disappeared and out half past eleven, when the eam of customers stopped, the editor an interesting half-hour with these o men who had worked equally hard the contest; one of them winning 000 and the other one an intensified erest in the Word of God. Mr. uerle told the story of how Sidney ith had done it better than Sidney ld have told it himself. "Why," said, "that fellow just lived with se pictures. He used to bring them er to my house, spread them out the table, and then we would talk em over with our friend Hubbert, who s also placed in the contest. Sidney uld say one verse was the one and would say another, Hubbert would another, and we would discuss it til we all got excited over it. Then would move them around and try is verse and that one until we were nearly dippy. Then the next day e would try it again. I just couldn't it the way Sidney did. I thought he as plain crazy and told him so. But would have it his way, and now you e what happened—he gets $1,000, I even typed his book and sent it for him, thinking all of the time that y book was better than his, and then came out on top." By that time Mr. Smith himself had got enthusiastic. He told how he had spent afternoons and evenings, day after day, going over the pictures and the book of texts, comparing and changing and comparing again, and how much he had enjoyed it, although he said he hadn't been much of a Bible-reader before. The editor asked him if he had gotten any new religious ideals out of it, and he said he thought he had.

It seems that there were five young men who worked together on Coral Street and disagreed together regarding the proper answers, the proper texts to fit the pictures. All of them are loyal church boys, clean-living boys, the only bad habit among the five being smoking, and only two of the five were guilty of that.

Mr. Smith went into business as an errand boy when he got through with grammar school. After working for several years for others he bought the little shop on Coral Street and for a time did a credit business. He kept two men working besides himself, but did all of his own worrying. A couple of years ago he changed to a cash basis, cut his business in two and doubled his profits by eliminating former losses. It is a prosperous little shop, and he said to Beuerle as the editor handed him the check, "Now we can buy that little automobile."

Several of the winners of the Contest have written, acknowledging receipt of their checks, and telling how much the Contest meant to them. Miss Mary E. Good, who won the Fourth Prize, thought that pictures 20 and 24 were the most difficult. She said she found the Contest very interesting and instructive, and that she got much better acquainted with the Bible through hunting the verses to fit the pictures.

Mrs. O. C. Newton, who won the Seventh Prize, participated in all three of the Contests which the Christian Herald ran but without success in the first two; said the pictures made the Bible seem more real, and that she found the Study an education as well. The pictures 17, 20 and 24 were the ones she found the most difficult.

Mr. Walter Balla, the winner of the Third Prize of $500, is in France in the service of his country, working in the American Post Office.

Successor to Dr. Jowett

THE Rev. Dr. John Kelman of Edinburgh, Scotland, has accepted a call to the pulpit of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church made vacant by the return of Dr. J. H. Jowett to England. Dr. Kelman, who is in his fifty-fifth year, is a graduate of Edinburgh University and became pastor of the North United Free Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh, in 1897. He visited the United States a year ago, preaching at Princeton and in a number of cities, and this last spring he came here again, giving a course of lectures at Yale.

This is the Acid

That Destroys Your Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Hidden in the Film

THE acid which destroys your teeth is lactic acid, produced from certain foods by action of bacteria.

The film on your teeth—that slimy film—holds the food substance while it ferments and forms acid. Then it holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

This film clings to teeth, gets between the teeth, enters crevices and stays. The ordinary dentifrice does not dissolve it. The tooth brush fails to remove it all. So it protects the acid. Free acids are neutralized by alkaline saliva.

That film is the source of nearly all tooth troubles. That is what discolors, not your teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It is a breeder of germs—millions of them. Those germs, with tartar, are the chief causes of pyorrhea.

Brushing the teeth does not suffice, as nearly everybody knows. You must remove the film. After painstaking research, dental science has found a way to do that. The way is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And we offer you a 10-Day Tube to show you what it does.

Use It 10 Days—Free

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

Ordinary pepsin will not do. It must be activated, and the usual agent is harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed impossible.

Now science has invented a harmless activating method. Five governments have already granted patents. Now active pepsin can be applied twice daily to the teeth.

Authorities have made many clinical tests. Thousands of dentists have tried it. And now leading dentists all over America urge its universal adoption.

Do You Remember
The Old Corn Doctor?

He stood on the street, in the olden days, and offered a "magic corn cure."

The same ingredients, harsh and inefficient, are sold in countless forms today.

But they did not end corns, and they do not now. Nor does padding, nor does paring—methods older still.

The One Right Way

Modern scientists in the Bauer & Black laboratories have evolved a perfect method and embodied it in Blue-jay.

In 48 hours, while the corn is forgotten, Blue-jay completely ends it, and forever. Hardly one corn in ten needs a second application.

The way is sure. It is easy, pleasant, scientific.

Quit old-fashioned methods. Try Blue-jay on one corn—tonight.

The Fear of the Lord

SUNDAY. Ps. 111 : 10. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." The fear of the Lord is the beginning, but it is not a beginning which we can ever leave behind as a stake can be discarded by a sapling when it has grown stronger and more matured. This reverence is not a beginning in the sense of being a rudiment. It is a beginning which is carried forward through all succeeding stages, and even into ultimate issues. It is like the alphabet, which, while forming the beginnings of literature, yet enters vitally into the loftiest creations of a Shakespeare or a Milton. Without the alphabet there can be no literature; without reverence there can be no religion.

It is in reverence that we must begin our quest of divine wisdom. We do not begin in faith, or in hope, or in love, but in vital and creative reverence, even in the fear of God which is the fountain of life. When the veil is lifted in Isaiah's vision, the seraphim who stand before us are revealed in very significant endowment. Each of them has six wings: "with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly." Four wings for reverence and two for practical service. We need have no uncertainty about our power of motion if we have the requisite mood. Perhaps the reason why our two wings are so often ineffective may be found in the absence of the four. We are feverishly ready for flight, but we are not so ready to bow before the Lord, and veil the face in reverent homage and communion. And may not it be that the two wings so frequently and so easily tire because they have not the restful support of the four wings hiding the soul in the secret fellowship of God? We so often fail in service because we have forgotten or ignored the creative beginning of things, which is the fear of God.

It is the mood of reverence which gives the soul its initial posture for discovering the things of God. In the quest of divine secrets it is infinitely more necessary to have the reverent spirit than to have a learned mind. There is all the difference in the world between mere cleverness and spiritual discernment. One is just worldly sharpness; the other is heavenly vision. "I thank thee that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes."

The Obstacle Race

MONDAY. Ps. 18 : 29. "By thee I have run through a troop, and by my God I have leaped over a wall." David was a warrior. There is much in his poetry which bespeaks the soldier. Yet he is singularly free from pride or boasting. Does he boast? "My soul shall make her boast in the Lord." In this respect we have his modern parallel in that Tennessee soldier who has been officially credited with the most marvelous personal military prowess in the Great War. "How did you do it?" Sergeant York was asked. "God was my helper," he replied. This is exactly what a brave soldier of the long ago is saying in this verse. He has broken through a troop—because God was with him. He has leaped over a wall—because God was with him. The first figure refers to meeting the enemy in open battle, the second to an attack on an entrenchment. He has triumphed in both forms of fighting—because was with him.

God's Promises

RIDAY. II Peter 1 : 4. Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and cious promises." The promises of d in Christ are the golden cords ich bind the books of the Bible together, reaching from Eden to Paradise. e Old and New Testaments are the venants of promise by which the mighty Father bequeaths his infinite eritance to his believing children. iarchs and prophets were called and omised by him who could not lie, who sealed his word with an oath that you might have a strong consolation, saying, "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as snow; come unto me and I will give you rest." "I go to prepare a place for you and will come again to receive you to myself." These enduring words are the pillars of truth in the temple of the Highest. Great promises lead us to become partakers of the divine nature, to pillow our heads upon such restful words as "him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out."

Promises are God's checks upon the sacrifice of his Son, sufficient to cover all our need. An unused check is useless; it must be presented and endorsed by faith in order to payment. It makes no difference who presents the paper; he may be the most worthless and guilty of mortals. God's promises of redemption will be honored at the bank of heaven, or the universe would be bankrupt. This draft is certified by the name and the blood of Jesus and will be cashed as sure as God lives. His riches are unsearchable, illimitable, both in material and spiritual treasures, and will never grow less because of his gifts. Remember, he that asketh, receiveth; seeketh, findeth. Aspiration means realization. Over these counters, guilt is exchanged for pardon, sorrow for joy, hunger for fullness and satisfaction, poverty for riches, and hell for heaven.

The Forgotten Cloak

SATURDAY. II Tim. 4 : 13. "The cloak that I left." Sometimes we are misled by phrases. When we say that a man is "going into" the Church, we mean that he will be ordained as a clergyman or minister and in many countries he will wear a special garb or "cloth." Those who were "added to" the early Church assumed no such special uniform—in fact, Paul thought so little of his cloak that he left it behind him at Troas, and Timothy had to bring it along to Rome. The brotherhood of saints belonged to laymen as much as to clergy, and every one, whatever his ecclesiastical status, could wash his robe and make it white in the blood of the Lamb. In an era of caste, slavery, and bitter oppression, this spiritual citizenship was a model for democracy.

I am one who is helped by symbols, including stained-glass windows. But I am endeavoring on this occasion to read my Bible by plain daylight. As a matter of history men like Peter and women like Dorcas did not wear elaborate vestments, or adopt stately poses, or appear under richly carven canopies. On the contrary, Paul was of mean appearance, and his only known gesture was a certain wonderful "beckoning of the hand" which at Antioch in Pisidia captured a synagogue, while in Jerusalem it silenced a mob. James expressly warns us against the respect of persons which picks out the man with the gold ring and the rich robe; while Timothy was told that the adornment of women should be, not broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array, but modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety and good works. Church parade, as we call it, was thus discouraged, and these people, living amid the luxury and the ostentation of the Roman Empire, avoided advertisement and anticipated by seventeen centuries the black coat with which the Republic of the United States encounters the gilded lace and ribands of European diplomacy. When Two Cooks Meet

The New Way of Soup Making

You would change your ideas of a ready-made soup if you came to the Van Camp kitchens.

You would see, for one thing, the world's finest kitchen. It cost $1,500,000. You would meet scientific cooks, men with college training. You would taste a soup which was the final result of comparing countless blends.

Then our culinary experts study to perfect it. They fix standards for every ingredient. They compare countless blends and methods. And they never stop until they attain the utmost in that soup. It takes several years, sometimes.

Haphazard Ways

The old ways of soup making were very inexact. The ablest chefs could never make soup twice alike. Home-made soups varied enormously.

In the Van Camp way we take a prize Parisian recipe. A noted chef from the Hotel Ritz in Paris makes the basic soup.

They Never Vary

Then every detail is fixed in a formula. And the Van Camp chefs forever follow it exactly.

The results are these; Every Van Camp soup is the finest of its kind in existence. It cannot be matched anywhere in the world, by any hotel or home.

The soups never vary. They come to you ready-prepared. And they cost no more than ordinary soups. They cost much less than home made.

Compare these Van Camp Soups with others. See what our skill and our care have accomplished. It will be a revelation.

Mission Started in an Invalid Chair

THREE years ago, a Christian woman who had been an invalid for many years invited her neighbors to her home to study the Gospel. This was the beginning of the Tengchowfu South Side Sunday School. Four women attended the first few meetings, and soon each one brought her friends and children, so that in a short time the home was too small to accommodate all.

A Chinese building was secured, and since then regular Sunday and midweek meetings have been held. The Sunday school has now an enrolment of over one hundred members. Six women have confessed Christ and have been received into the church.

The girls' school which was opened in this same building at present has an enrolment of twenty-four scholars, who also attend services regularly.

During the winter vacation for two weeks a Bible-class for women was conducted in this school building. Ten women came daily and studied the Catechism and Mark's Gospel and learned a number of hymns. Many have acknowledged Christ as fidelity at the cross and sepulcher. She had given the best she had—her two sons—to Christ. So she had faith, devotion and sacrifice to voice her prayer. But Jesus gently replied, "You know not what you ask," and then proceeded to explain to the disappointed mother that what she thought honor and glory for her sons would have meant a baptism of trial and pain severer than human nature might be able to endure. Aye! how often is it the case that our prayers are unanswered for this reason of Salome—"that we know not what we ask." That thorn which we so pleaded to have taken away is a precious discipline of grace. That joy, that prosperity, that prize, for which our soul so yearns, would prove the very worst thing for us, a hurt to our peace of mind and to our health of body. When the Israelites murmured at the manna, and prayed for flesh, we read: "And God gave them their request, but sent them leanness of heart." They knew not what they asked, and their complaining prayer was answered to their hurt, because God would thus show his displeasure. And how often we have asked for things most ardently and felt pained and distrustful that we did not get them, when God was saying: "My child, you know not what you ask, but I do, and I love you quite too much to grant your request to your sorrow and hurt."

PRAYER is indeed a precious privilege. Among all the means of grace, sermons, sacraments, Sabbaths, providence, the greatest in some respects is prayer. For needy sinful men and women to be permitted to come into the presence of the infinitely great and holy God in prayer, to make confession unto him of their sins, to unburden before him the troubles and cares which weigh heavily upon them, and to present their requests for needed stre wisdom and guidance, is a priv

It is indeed a world-wide plan. In the city of Tokyo, Japan, 12,000 Sunday school children paraded before the Imperial Palace, sending up a balloon with the streamer "God is love." At Seoul, Korea, a parade, the largest in the Orient, of 16,000 marched and sang, the Salvation Army leading, in the old palace grounds.

1,500 Girls Lost on Trains

HE Travelers Aid report 1,500 girls lost in a year from through trains between New York and Chicago. w many thousands the rest of the ntry furnish can only be conjectured. A proposed solution of the problem is in matrons, high-grade women for ough trains and many others enter- g our cities.

"How many times I have seen young ls get off the train with some new acaintance before reaching their desation and I have been powerless to event it," says a conductor. "My ain has moved on and I have felt it uld have been better for that girl to ve been crushed under the wheels an to have gone into the dreadful unown with that stranger."

A train matron would have acted as d a noble woman in Central Iowa, who eatened to call a policeman if two ls on her train did not go on to their stination.

A certain type of brute, after throw- g his grips into a seat will say, "Well, guess I will go through the train and e what I can pick up,"—something he ould not be likely to do if a train atron were on board.

It is common knowledge among travlers that unprotected girls and young omen are put to a great test on through rains where they have no one to counel and guide them.

A traveler mentions the birth of a hild where the mother was the only oman on board, and numbers of girls who ask for directions when approaching cities who could so easily be given rong information. Train matrons ould be appealed to in such cases and ull information given of the dangers of our cities.

It is proposed that high-grade, capable women, with some first-aid training all [illegible] made [illegible] matrons, whose uties [illegible] to look after women generally, and especially to become acquainted with and help in every way all oung women traveling alone. They ould be supplied with leaflets pointing ut the dangers of our big cities and of aveling alone. The railways would pay salaries, furnish meals and transportation.

All coaches might have holders at the seats for warning, and helpful literature generally. Travelers find time heavy on their hands and would gladly read such.

Why is it that railways have neglected giving special care in this way to the hundreds of millions of women travelers, the very class which most needs one of their own sex? How many thousands of car-sick women would be thankful for the assistance of train matrons? Some roads now furnish colored maids for first-class passengers, the very class which needs them least.

Millions of girls and children would travel more safely under the protection of women of high character.

The idea has been endorsed by the Minnesota State Federation of Women's Clubs, and by the Travelers' Aid of New York, which is now doing a fine work in helping girls after arriving at stations in big cities.

Interplanetary Messages

A FEW weeks ago Marconi startled the world by stating that he had often received strong wireless signals which seemed to come from beyond the earth. In a recent interview published in the New York Evening Post Nikola Tesla too reminds us that he had made known to the world years ago the fact that extraplanetary signals were recorded in his Colorado laboratory. That was in 1899, before the world dreamed of wireless.

He is the Talcum Professor!

HE'S the small person who has taught the world to appreciate Talcum—Mr. Baby, with an honorary degree from the College of Comfort. He knew what he wanted—and got it for the whole family.

He had a hard time the first six months—with a skin like finest satin and constant torments of irritation besieging it. So he squirmed up into a ball and let everyone know his monstrous treatment.

But they found Mennen's! Mennen Borated Talcum Powder cooled and soothed baby's flower-soft skin and brought refreshing sleep. And it also won over every member of baby's family to the Mennen Idea.

Mennen Talcum—after the shower-bath—takes the discomfort of perspiration out of work, makes tight garments loose, tight shoes comfortable, smooths the sheets to the feeling of silk on a hot night, is a delightful toilet adjunct, and, in the special Talcum for Men, is wholly satisfactory after shaving.

From East to West. The Abyssinia Mission to the United States, all the members of which are affiliated with the ancient Abyssinian church, was officially welcomed to New York City on July 24 at the Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The desire for closer unity between the Episcopal and Abyssinian churches was voiced by all the speakers.

Studying the City. Seventy-five young Methodist leaders from other cities began on July 24 a five-day study of New York City. They were taken in groups of ten to church and community centers, missions and rescue homes, to Chinatown and Ellis Island. The tours were planned to complete the training of the group of young men for social service and for leadership in reconstruction projects.

Democracy in the Church. Bishop Charles D. Williams of Michigan, preaching at Grace Church, New York City, on July 20, declared "The Church must wake up. The crisis is upon us. Democracy's fundamental creed is confidence is the innermost worth of the undermost man. The democratization of industry is coming. The next step is a co-partnership—employer, employee and the public." He intimated that the church must preach and fight for social justice and a Christian democracy.

Dirigible Wrecks a Bank. More About Mexico. The House rules committee, conducting an inquiry into conditions in Mexico, questioned Ambassador Henry P. Fletcher on July 22. Mr. Fletcher said that in the last three years more than fifty Americans had been murdered, but that so far as he knew not a single Mexican had been arrested and prosecuted for the murders.

Rioting in Washington. The most serious disturbances since Civil War days kept Washington in a turmoil for four nights ending July 23. Trouble began with clashes between groups of soldiers and negroes in the southeast part of the city. The disorder rapidly spread until the capital was virtually under martial law with more than 2,000 soldiers and sailors under Major-General Haan aiding the police. When the situation was brought under control, six men had been killed and seventy-three wounded.

Cruelties in Army Prisons. Reports of extreme cruelty toward soldiers confined in army prisons in France were confirmed by General Peyton C. March, chief of staff, in testimony before a house investigating committee on July 23. Several officers and non-commissioned officers have been court martialed for their conduct, but the investigating committee now is seeking "the man higher up."

France Bids on Our War Supplies. Negotiations are in progress between the war department and the French government for the sale to France of enormous quantities of war supplies left abroad with the return of the army. Several hundred miles of railroad track, docks, lumber, 1,300 locomotives, 17,000 freight cars, 10,000 passenger automobiles and 50,000 trucks are among the items. France offers one-fifth of the cost price for all the property.

Another Understanding with Mexicans. Brigadier-General W. R. Smedburg, commanding the Arizona border military district, held a conference with General Calles, governor of Sonora and a member of the Carranza cabinet, on July 24 and an agreement was reached for cooperation to maintain order along the Arizona-Sonora frontier. On the same day the Fifth regular division, just back from the Rhine, was ordered to Camp Gordon, Ga.

Flying Around the Rim. Lieutenant Colonel R. S. Hartz, U.S. A., and a crew of four men on July 24 began a flight from Washington in a bombing airplane around the border of the United States. The distance is 7,805 miles. The route follows the Atlantic coast to Maine, the Canadian border from Maine to the Great Lakes, the Canadian border to Seattle, down the Pacific coast and along the Mexican border, the gulf coast and the south Atlantic, back to Washington. Colonel Hartz excepts to be in the capital again by August 10.

The World's Greatest Ships. The U. S. shipping board on July 24 announced that construction will begin almost immediately on the two largest steamships ever built. They will be 1,000 feet long, with a gross tonnage of 55,000. They will carry 3,000 passengers in addition to a crew of 1,000 and will have a speed of 30 knots, enabling them to make the trip from New York to Liverpool in four days. They will be fitted with gun platforms, and in time of emergency will be converted into commerce destroyers.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

THE MAN AS I KNEW HIM

By FERDINAND COWLE IGLEHART, D.D.

of the Editorial Staff of the Christian Herald

I am for the square deal"

DOCTOR IGLEHART has written for the Christian Herald (to publish in book form) his appreciation of Theodore Roosevelt, from an intimate friendship of many years. The Author cooperated with the Colonel back in the strenuous days when Colonel Roosevelt, as Police Commissioner of New York City, made the saloons obey the law on Sunday closing. For over 20 years, the two had been intimate friends. Dr. Iglehart honors in this appreciation the memory of a great personality who has left a warm spot in the hearts of all Americans.

WHAT THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS SAYS:

THE books about Theodore Roosevelt begin to make their appearance, one after another, and within a year or two the number of them will be considerable. It is understood that ve are soon to have Mr. Bishop's authorized biography, based argely upon Roosevelt letters and papers. There will be essays, stimates and tributes from many sources. Meanwhile there will lso be popular volumes, some of them mere compilations made ut of newspaper clippings, and others genuine books written out of good deal of knowledge and from the standpoint of the particular uthor.

One of these now appearing entitled "Theodore Roosevelt, The Man as I Knew Him," has been written by the Rev. Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart and is a book that will hold its place just as some of the books about Lincoln have survived as written by neighbors or associates who knew him intimately. Dr. Iglehart—who has had a long career as one of the most eloquent of the Methodist preachers and as one of the leaders in the temperance movement—has always had a talent for politics, and through the whole of Roosevelt's career the older man was a profound admirer of the younger. Through a great part of that career the preacher was the warm and devoted friend of the politician and statesman.

Dr. Iglehart's biography of Roosevelt is intensely personal. It is the kind of book that will be read with sympathy and pleasure by old and young in many a modest home. The book will be a family treasure for one reason above all others, namely, that its hero-worship is genuine from beginning to end. It does not try to be a critical estimate of the Rooseveltian period in American politics, nor a philosophic study of Roosevelt's personality. It begins by giving Roosevelt a sure rank with Washington and Lincoln, and then proceeds to tell the story of his boyhood, his youth, and his manhood, in a very readable, unsophisticated fashion that does credit not only to the robust American manhood of the subject, but also to that of the nature-loving, humane and large-spirited author.

The chapters in Mr. Roosvelt's early official life are here restated with delightful freshness, and with many touches of new material in the way of anecdotes and illustrative sidelights. As a very skilful public speaker, accustomed to hold popular audiences, Dr. Iglehart understands the use of anecdotes and the personal appeal. Knowing Colonel Roosevelt well, he had many conversations with him at different times, as had many other friends of the Colonel. But most of those friends would not now be able to write out a statement of such conversations, giving the Colonel's own vernacular. Dr. Iglehart perhaps made notes at the time. However that may be, he manages to reproduce a great many conversations which are excellent reading and which are positive additions to the stock of material which the public will be glad to possess. Dr. Iglehart is able to tell us more than most of the Colonel's friends knew in answer to questions regarding religious views and personal characteristics. He has several chapters dealing with such matters.

The reader will regard it as not less appropriate than convenient that Dr. Iglehart has found space to give us some of the memorial tributes that were called out soon after Colonel Roosevelt's death. He has included that of Archdeacon Carnegie in Westminster Abbey, that of Mr. Chauncey Depew, a fine one by Bishop Luther B. Wilson of the Methodist Church, and at greatest length the superb oration of Henry Cabot Lodge in the United States Senate. The address of Charles E. Hughes is also given at length, with those of Chairman Will H. Hays and Gifford Pinchot. Dr. Lyman Abbott's tribute in the Outlook is reprinted, as are estimates by Gen. Leonard Wood, Secretary Lane, and Chancellor James R. Day. Gen. Goethals contributes an original chapter about Mr. Roosevelt's relation to the Panama Canal, and Dr. Albert Shaw has written a chapter at Dr. Iglehart's request on Mr. Roosevelt's characteristics in the office of the Presidency.

In one or two concluding chapters, Dr. Iglehart compares some of the great achievements of Roosevelt with the labors of Hercules. Thus the book is not merely a labor of love and appreciation, but it is an unusual book in its range of fresh information. It will be welcome in that it sustains so fully the best of the Roosevelt traditions. The nation likes to believe in its leaders; and the spirit of hero-worship is still eager in its quests. Americans like to believe that Roosevelt was highly worthy of affection and honor; and Dr. Iglehart's book will do much to convince the next generation as well as to satisfy contemporaries.

VISITING OUR FOLKS

THE other day I started on a run through New York and Eastern Ohio to visit some of the 300,000 families of the Christian Herald. The first place at which I stopped was a big farm just outside of Watkins, New York, just after dinner time.

The farmer—a fine, clean-built, typical modern American—was sitting on his front porch reading the Christian Herald.

"I've been following everything you people have been doing in improving our paper," he said.

We discussed current questions for perhaps half an hour. He told me the thing he found most interesting about the Christian Herald was the way it had jumped into big modern questions and was handling them from a new point of view—giving them a Christian interpretation.

"After all," he said, "outside the big cities, people are still mighty bound up in their churches. You take the towns around here—the solid people, the folks who run the banks and the farms and the waterworks and the street railways are still old-fashioned enough to go to church on Sundays and send the children to Sunday school."

In all, I visited twenty average American towns. I talked with bankers, railroad men, a judge or two, farmers, real estate men, and the wives of nearly all of them.

This is the thing I saw everywhere I went:

FIRST: The people who go to church nowadays are healthy, active human beings with a live interest in the world and its affairs; proud of their children; anxious to secure good health and the best possible education for them, together with a share in the pleasant things of life.

SECOND: These people look on the church as their natural social meeting-ground. It is through the church and their church activities that they get together, talk things over, discuss the big questions of the day.

And these are the people who read the Christian Herald—300,000 families of them.

They read the Christian Herald because it is not afraid to discuss big public questions in a big way, instead of keeping to the narrow track of purely sectarian matters. Because it meets their demand for a family magazine that is wholesome, trustworthy, religious, and yet keenly alive to all current topics of the day and all human needs.

ELPING THE WORLD TO HEALTH

Henry P. Davison, Apostle of a Great Movement for Uplifting All Humanity, Outlines His Plans for a World League of Red Cross Societies to Operate in Times of Peace

Interview by RAE D. HENKLE

Henry P. Davison

THE world has known the Red Cross as an agency for relief in flood and famine, war and pestilence. The magnitude of its work has shown it to be a tremendous force for good in these directions; a force with which no other movement can be compared.

"The world now needs more than remedial agencies. It needs highly concentrated and strongly supported preventive activities that can control, minimize or eradicate, as nearly as is humanly possible, those ills of humanity we have been helping to relieve.

"In brief, we intend to make the Red Cross THE EMBLEM OF HEALTH."

Henry P. Davison, formerly director of the American Red Cross and now chairman e Board of Governors of the League of Red Societies of the World, thus visualized the e of that great organization in which, for the d of our participation in the Great War, he had a big and vital influence.

WAS in an atmosphere strikingly antipodal that r. Davison explained his conception of the newer nsibilities of the Red Cross. We were sitting s office in J. P. Morgan & Company's build- n the heart of America's financial maelstrom. ugh an open window came the continuous roar e curb market, a short block away. Across d Street ebbed and flowed uncounted fortunes gh the portals of the Stock Exchange. Outside or was the buzz of a stock ticker, the hierogly- ed tape unrolling itself ceaselessly into a wicker t in time to the changing quotations in the mar- n the other side of the street.

ran back over a yard or so of the paper ribbon. e two or three dozen stocks quoted, Mr. Davison, recall, was able to identify two!

siness, big or little, lost its significance, however, e face of humanity's needs as this apostle of the ment for a better world explained his conception e World League of Red Cross Societies, the ness with which the idea was seized, and the usiasm with which it was developed during the y spring and summer.

ith the signing of the armistice in November major activities of the American Red virtually came to an end," Mr. Davison said. had built up during the progress of hostilities an organization which reached into every village and hamlet in the country. The people of the United States were thinking, as they never had thought before, of their responsibilities to a suffering world. It seemed to me impossible that this wonderful spirit, this perfect organization, should be permitted to die away and disintegrate. War needs would very soon largely disappear, but the incalculable distress and misery resulting from war would be upon us, and all that in addition to the needs of the poor and afflicted of the world of normal times. 'Why isn't it possible to form an international organization to work for better health which will retain and operate through the effective Red Cross agencies already established in the countries at war?' I asked myself.

"THE thought developed in my mind, and at last I went to President Wilson and laid the idea before him. His interest in it was immediate and his assurance of support for the undertaking was promptly given to me.

"I went to Paris and called a meeting, which was attended by the Red Cross executives of England, France, Italy and Japan. They saw the opportunity of establishing a world benefaction, and met it with a whole-hearted welcome that was inspiring. We decided to call a conference to be held at Cannes in March, to which would be invited all the experts, all the specialists, in every line of health and welfare work.

"As it turned out, this was just the thing these great men of science had been dreaming of. When we gathered at Cannes we found what was perhaps the most important group of humanitarians ever brought together assembled for the conference. They had long recognized the need for some such movement as we were planning; the vast possibilities for world good that underlay it; but the organization had been lacking. This organization we would now provide for them.

"The conference adopted an introductory statement which included this paragraph:

" 'The conference heartily approves of the purpose of a committee of Red Cross Societies to extend greatly the activities of the Red Cross in times of peace, to the prevention of disease and the betterment of the health and general welfare of the people in all countries. The prosperity and happiness of all the nations of the world can be greatly furthered by the power of man to promote health and to prevent disease—a power which has been vastly increased in the last half century by scientific discoveries—so as to render this new field of activity of incalculable racial significance, both socially and economically.'

"THE work at Cannes was divided and placed in the hands of a number of sections, each of which formulated reports and recommendations for transmission to the conference. A series of thirteen resolutions was adopted embodying these reports and relating to the special subjects of preventive medicine, child welfare, tuberculosis, malaria, venereal diseases and nursing, among others, for the purpose of indicating in a general way some of the lines of activity which the new organization might follow.

"Arrangements were made at Cannes for the establishment of headquarters at Geneva under the direction of a secretary general. To this important position Lieutenant-General Sir David Henderson was appointed. Associated with him in the permanent organization are men who are authority in their particular branches of science, who head the various bureaus into which the work almost automatically divides. Sufficient funds have already been placed at the disposal of the League to assure its growth for the ensuing three years, and by the end of that time a permanent financial policy will have been applied which will make certain its continued expansion.

"AS it was ultimately formulated, the work of the League of Red Cross Societies of the World divides into three phases:

"First, the encouragement and promotion of local Red Cross organizations in every country in the world.

"Second, the collection and distribution of scientific information for the prevention, the control, and the cure of disease, and for the betterment of health generally.

"Third, the coordination of international relief efforts in times of disaster.

"In explanation of the first phase, there are many countries which wholly lack, or have imperfectly developed and only partly effective, Red Cross organizations. We want to see to it that there is not a civilized state without such an organization; active, well directed and strongly supported. If we find, for instance, that Liberia is without a Red Cross we will approach the government with suggestions on the desirability of the state joining the betterment movement. At the invitation of the government—but only on its invitation—we will send a representative to the capital who shall be the guest of the government. With him will go a staff of men and women who know how to arouse the interest of the people, how to bring them together and how to establish and maintain the local and national organizations. Traveling exhibits, mobile clinics, lecturers and demonstrators will show and explain to the people the needs of sanitation, the principles of hygiene and the care of children prenatally as well as after birth.

"We will leave in that state a full understanding of the means to better health, a more complete grasp of the need of interdependence of peoples for health and morality, and a Red Cross functioning actively and ready to take its place with all others in the world in a time of great emergency.

"It is possible that in many respects the second phase of the work may be regarded as of greatest importance. Certainly it would be difficult to overemphasize the benefits that will accrue from it.

"In Geneva we are establishing a complete research laboratory to which will be called the most eminent scientists available. Attached to it will be a bureau for the exchange of all scientific information, which will reach into the most obscure parts of the world.

"As it is today, a man in New York may be working on a problem for the prevention or cure of disease that a man in Vienna or Paris or Tokio solved a year or two ago. Or the New York man may have perfected a serum that the investigators in other centers are still struggling over. We are providing in our headquarters a clearing-house for all these men, so that the instant one has developed a new process it will be made available to every one who may be interested in it, and it will be made available in such form that its use will not be circumscribed for a longer time than will be required for the dissemination of the information.

"As an instance of the possibilities: 'About a year ago the dreaded Spanish influenza first made its appearance in virulent form. No one knew much about it. The people of the United States, and even the professional men, heard of it only after it had reached enormous proportions abroad and had taken a great toll of life. Its spread was rapid—so rapid that it seemed literally to jump the oceans. It caused something like 600,000 deaths in America alone before it finally burnt itself out.

"Had the Geneva headquarters been open then, news of the appearance of a strange and deadly malady would have been flashed to the research bureau at once. From there scientists in every city of the world would have been called into consultation by cable. Everything known concerning the disease would have been explained to them and they would have been asked for advice or suggestions. It is possible none of them could have provided a cure immediately, but they would have said: 'We don't know much about it yet. Until we can learn more, do this, and this.' And in a few days at the most the world-wide machinery for combating the trouble and preventing its spread would have been in motion.

"IT IS really inspiring to see the wonderful enthusiasm with which the men of science—the men on whom the physical well-being of all the people of the earth depends—have greeted this opportunity to make the fruit of their labors available quickly everywhere. The spirit of cooperation has been unanimous. In the beginning, when we were seeking the advice of various experts, some of our foreign friends said: 'Will they come down here and talk to us? They are busy men. If they come, will they not charge us large fees?'

" 'If they charge, we will pay them. But I don't believe they will ask for a fee,' was my reply.

"Not only were they there, and without charge, but they frequently expressed their gratitude that such an organization as we proposed was in process of formation, and that they could help in launching it.

"One of our principal activities, too, will be the coordination of all large-scale relief work. The League will not take away the initiative of the national Red Cross organizations, but it will attempt to direct the efforts of each of these into the channels that will be most effective in an emergency. It will undertake to prevent duplication, dissipation of energy and waste of supplies that are almost inevitable when several entirely separate units are converging at a common point, all bearing their burden of medicines, food, clothing and shelter.

"A flood or famine in China; an earthqu

The Little Things That Satisfy

By CHARLES GRANT MILLER

"PLEASE, can't I have my dolly first, before I go to the hospital?"

Never a cry nor a whimper had the fair-haired child made since a heavy wagon wheel had crushed her little body. She lay where she had been playing in the street in front of her home. She was eight years old.

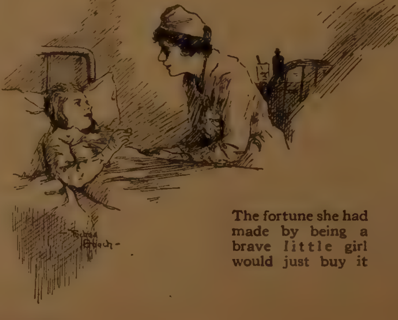
Before the ambulance came a man had bent over her. "You're a brave little girl," said he. "When the doctors have made you well, buy a doll with this." He put a quarter in her hand.

The surgeon saw there was only a "long chance" of saving her. He hurried her to the operating-table, and there was quick, desperate work with the knife to make the most of that chance. Through hours under the anesthetic the little hand never relaxed its hold on the silver piece.

When Annie came to herself in a white cot she gossiped cheerily with the nurse about the dolly. She had seen just the one she wanted in a shop window, and the fortune she had won by being a brave little girl would "just buy it." Not a word of complaint came from the whitening lips. The little girl was in a happy world of her own—hers and the dolly's.

So little a thing can make the sorrows of the world slink away, ashamed, before a radiant hope!

This is no "made-up" story. It happened just as related. And a day later the coroner's physician at his task among the dead, found Annie's body waiting for him to issue leave for burial. Her stiff little hand still held the bit of silver, which went with her.



The fortune she had made by being a brave little girl would just buy it

IT WAS only a little thing, that quarter. But i enough to create hope that filled Annie's soul joy ineffable, to rout pain and fear, to cheat de its terrors—enough to turn the stone head-r anguish into a downy pillow of peace. Yes, i enough. It was the door through which A smiling, stepped into Painless Land, where she her dolly, no doubt.

It was a little thing in a little life. Yet how a mighty man of the world, sated with riches power and fame, would give all he has gained to in the midst of all his triumphs one hour of su satisfying joy as this little girl had in the mi poverty and pain, and in the face of death.

It was a little life, but there is a great lesson
It was a little hope she had, but it was so abso so satisfying, that we may know nothing swee this world.

It was little, but enough.

Men plan great enterprises and hope that in success they will find happiness. But material like the end of the rainbow, always in the v just beyond.

Many a man makes of his life a long journey,

Once the wheat is in and has ered by rain and sunshine, without drought ch rain, the period of danger is from August . This is the period when the wheat heads are lk—heavy enough to be knocked flat by rain, ough to be damaged by the slightest frost. t of preparing wheat land, seed, labor and machinery, was about five dollars per acre a few seasons back; now it is $12; therefore, a 1,000-acre field of wheat represents an investment of $12,000 to the wheat farmer. It would take slight touch of frost or a few hours of hot wind to wipe out the grower's opportunity of returning his investment. By the same token, the proper amount of moisture, minus the hot wind, and a veritable sea of gold is soon waving awaiting the click of the harvesting machines, representing a fortune to the grower.

But the proportion of spring to winter wheat is always sufficient to carry us over any disaster resulting from frost or drought, and so the worry about wheat has simmered down to one for the individual wheat grower, rather than for the consumer.

Since early spring, agents of the Department of Labor have been marshaling men by the thousands from Eastern industrial centers to the great wheat growing centers, to aid in seeding, harvesting and threshing the crop. Wages are this season being paid undreamed of a few seasons ago. Ordinary helpers are receiving five dollars per day of ten hours, while the experts operating the tractors and combined harvesters and threshers receive three times as much. As the price of wheat to the grower increases, so also the price he must pay to produce it.

Harvesting wheat is a strenuous task. For days previous to the opening of the harvest season men and teams are kept busy erecting temporary cook houses and sleeping quarters. These are usually located in the midst of the vast wheat fields. Wells are drilled and stalls made for the horses. Bedding and kitchen utensils are taken to the camps last of all. Everything necessary for the men, machinery and teams is on the spot when the harvest starts. At no place in the big fields will the men be out of hearing of the dinner horn, which sounds very good to the men after six hours under the sweltering, hot sun.

The "bugle" sounds in the harvest camp at 3 o'clock in the morning, the men working in shifts until darkness falls. This is the method employed in garnering a great wheat crop, and no one who has visited the fields will doubt the truth of the Biblical verse which advises that man shall not have bread, save by the sweat of his brow; or that modern wheat raising is on a scale less efficient than that employed by our large industrial establishments.

While more people are living in the world today dependent upon rice than upon wheat for subsistence and a greater number of the human family live upon millet than any other cereal food, wheat is the preferred food among the higher civilized peoples. The more progressive peoples of the earth have ever been wheat eaters. Grains of wheat have been discovered in Egyptian tombs of the firsty dynasty, dating back 4,000 B.C., while bread of wheat has been excavated from the ruins of the prehistoric lake dwellers of Wagner and Robenhausen in Switzerland.

Whether you appreciate the fact or not, the successful harvesting of the American wheat crop has a direct bearing upon every citizen under the Stars and Stripes, as well as the comfort and welfare of many millions of Europe, who for five years have depended wholly upon the surplus wheat crop of the United States for their daily bread.

Men are enchanted with the sowing of the wheat seeds, with harvesting the golden fields of grain, with the hum of the great threshing machines, with the movement of the great cars and ships laden with the trillions of tiny berries, with the burring of the mighty mills, with the mysteries of the bake oven, and the never-cloying pleasure of white bread covered with June-yellow butter.

Until in recent decades the history of the varieties of wheat, and of other cereals, was not of record. No doubt selection by man in more or less of a blundering manner has gone on for many centuries. Hybridizing, by natural agencies, also may have occasionally occurred often enough to aid materially in making new varieties by blending the good qualities of two or more parent kinds.

At present there are thousands of varieties of wheat, most of which have been originated in recent years by wheat breeders working with more or less of system. But the world's bread-wheat varieties comprise but a dozen kinds. The fingers of the two hands would suffice to count the bread wheats produced in the United States today.

Wheat production is a world problem today more than ever. American investigators have been at work for years upon the subject. As a country grows older the food problem becomes more complex. New soils give back in prodigal measures food for the eater and seed for the sower. There are certain underlying principles in wheat production, applicable to all soils and all countries, and American investigators have been busy collecting and classifying data from all ages and all countries for the benefit of the American wheat grower in his search for the best methods of seeding, best varieties to produce, and most profitable methods of handling the crop from seeding to harvesting and threshing.

Many of the present superior wheats produced in the United States were introduced into this country from Asia, Europe and South America, and climated to our country while undergoing the test. They have been bred and crossed until a berry has been secured which will adapt itself to the region requiring a wheat crop. Thus, the present great American wheat crop is the result of assembling the better wheat strains of all countries into the United States, and employing the most advanced scientific and mechanical methods of handling our wheat crop.

Fourteen Years of Tractor Progress

AS YET the tractor industry is comparatively young, but the farm horse is rapidly following his city brother into the discard. The trend is toward motorized farms and the elimination of horse and hand power. Prior to 1904 most power farming was done by steam, but many unsatisfactory conditions resulted finally in the elimination of steam as a source of power for plowing and other farm operations. Fuel was bulky while storage space was small, several men were required, and the steam engine could not stand the rough usage experienced in the fields. Considerable time was spent in care and repair; maintenance and operating costs were almost prohibitive. As a natural result of all these drawbacks there came the development of the internal combustion engine with gasoline or kerosene as its fuel. The first gas tractor was placed upon the market in 1905; this was a two-cylindered machine employing gasoline as fuel and oil for cooling; it was of about twenty horsepower nominally, but actually developed almost forty horsepower, and surprised all observers by pulling from six to eight plows, depending upon the soil; few, if any, of the most modern machines today exceed this former record.

By 1908 interest had so grown in the Northwest that it was determined to hold an exhibition of gas tractors; seven manufacturers entered, but only five were able to demonstrate their machines satisfactorily. In 1909 it was estimated that perhaps fifty concerns were producing tractors, but only a small percentage of there were of any real value. Now there are no less than 160 firms actively engaged in the manufacture of tractors.

Soil conditions and price are the largest factors in selecting a machine; naturally the most popular are the small ones capable of pulling two or three plows and performing the work of three or four horses; more of this type of tractors are built than of all the others combined.

The following production figures illustrate the enormous growth of the tractor industry in the past seven years: 1912, 11,500; 1913, 15,000; 1914, 21,000; 1915, 29,670; 1917, 62,742; 1918, 132,697; 1919, 314,936 (estimated). G. P.

An Industrial Foil to Bolshevism

By Lorena S. Ellis

The rest room becomes an evening school in millinery. The intricate problem of the new hat

IN THESE days when Bolshevism is, if we may believe our daily papers, running rampant over the countries across the sea and threatening to pounce upon our own beloved land in any unguarded moment, it is most comforting, one might almost say exhilarating, to look now and then upon our fortresses and be reassured in the contemplation of their strength.

In a recent article, the statement is made that this country is in no danger from Bolshevism or any other forms of revolutionary uprisings so long as our industrial conditions are such that employees can live and work according to our American standards. If this is true, and I firmly believe it is, then those manufacturing concerns that are founded on the principle of co-operation may be regarded as our high towers of defense against this threatening evil; for, quoting further from the article mentioned, "co-operation in industry is not only a useful implement, it is the only one that is going to enable industry to survive under modern conditions."

It was a conversation between two girls which I overheard, as we were standing closely crowded together in the foyer of a picture theatre, that caused me to visit the plant of a Denver, Col., concern of this type, for which one of the girls said she was working. She had had lots of fun that day during the noon hour, and she was learning millinery after working hours. "Oh no, there isn't time to go home for supper," she said; "the company gives us our supper out there." Now, what sort of a concern, I asked myself, was this that had mid-day recreation and furnished supper for employees who stayed to learn millinery? I at once decided to visit this unusual rubber-plant and investigate.

It was about ten o'clock the next morning when the conductor of the car on which I was riding said, "The next is your street, madam." I had asked him to let me off at the Gates Rubber Company. I got off, and my first thought was that that stupid conductor had put me off at some co-ed school, instead of a factory. Men, women, boys and girls, hundreds of them, were lined up in front of the buildings; two men in military uniforms, standing on elevated platforms in front of this army, were putting them through a series of calisthenics; limbs and bodies moved and swayed in rhythmic unison; then they turned and marched into the buildings.

The conductor had not made a mistake—the buildings were those of the Rubber Company.

Established only seven years ago, this company has had a phenomenal growth, employing at the present time 1,400 men and women, and occupying 14 buildings with a floor space of 10 acres.

Charles C. Gates, the head of the concern, is one of those rare human amalgamations, a man with high ideals, visions, dreams, and withal the practical ability to successfully manipulate the intricate workings of a large business enterprise. That he has made his business a vehicle for carrying out some of his cherished dreams is plainly evidenced to any visitor who looks beyond the mere surface of things. The business is growing with amazing rapidity; if any men or women there employed are not growing in efficiency and value to the world's work, it is because they fail to use the opportunities that are not only given, but almost thrust upon them.

The physical welfare of the employees is given every possible care and consideration. That is why at 10 A.M. and 3 P.M. every day a gong clangs somewhere near the center of the acre of office desks, business stops, and the office force, 500 strong, marches outdoors for the ten-minute "pep" recess. Mr. Gates is always in the front row. He goes through these physical culture "stunts" twice every day regularly and enthusiastically.

This recess is not confined to the office force. Any employee of the factory may join in if he so desires. All are on their feet the minute that gong strikes. These "pep" classes were started as a defensive against the "flu"; so effective were they and so "pep" inspiring, that open air and exercise have c

What do these song services, these dances, and these calisthenics cost the company each year? Well, somewhat over $100,000. To estimate what they bring in return is not within the range of mathematics, but Mr. Gates today attributes the success he has had in building the biggest rubber business west of the Mississippi River largely to these features and, more than all else, to co-ordinated co-operation, as exemplified in the Gates clubs.

The Gates Club proper, composed of 75 men, is to the corporation what the national cabinet is to the United States government. It confers on all questions of policy. No new business idea is adopted by the company until it has been thoroughly discussed by the members of this club. Limited in membership, it is a goal coveted by virtually every employee of the concern. The qualifications for membership are ambition, alertness, efficiency, and the man who does not possess these qualities has little chance for membership.

The club meets twice a month. The Alexander Hamilton Business Course is being studied, and lectures by specialists of wide education and experience are given. In fact, the club is a training school in executive ability, business enterprise and efficiency that is producing men of the kind, the only kind, for which the great concerns of the world today are searching.

Mr. Gates says of this club: "It's our biggest asset. When a concern wants machinery, supplies, etc., it knows just where and how to get them; but when it wants men, not mere automatons, but men such as every concern that rises above mediocrity must have, how elusive is the search! Our club is discovering, producing them. We've declared more dividends on it than any other Gates product."

Then there is the Girls' Club, under the direction of Edna Howard. No wonder so many girls stay after closing time several times a month. That evening hour is an event to be looked forward to throughout the whole day. All who stay for evening classes are the guests of the company at supper, and it's such a quiet, happy meal they have together, up there in that cafeteria, or on the roof-garden in the golden glow of a wonderful Colorado sunset. After supper there are classes in millinery, dressmaking, and hairdressing.

NOW what, one might ask has dressmaking, hat trimming, etc., to do with the business of making rubber tires? Why, nothing; their irrelevancy is absolute. But they have much to do with the making of women, with making them self-reliant, self-supporting, as a vast army of the women of today are and needs must be.

To a Mr. Scrooge it may seem altogether unbelievable that any business concern should conduct classes in which the employees are taught the very things that tend to lead them out into other lines of work, and leave vacant places in the factory ranks. That here in this Western city such a factory really exists, makes one wonder if there are not spirits abroad in the land akin to the three spirits that visited old Scrooge in the silent night hours—spirits that are transforming the tight-fisted, grasping, gold-worshiping world into a world of friendliness, brotherly-kindness, love.

Such industrial concerns are the strongholds that make safe the communities in which they exist; for under such conditions, people may not only live according to American standards, but in harmony with American ideas of progress.

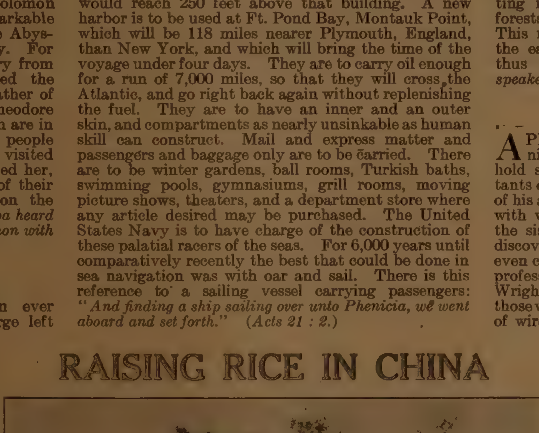
reatest Ships on Seas

United States Shipping Board has announced the plans for the con- of two huge ocean liners, 1,000 , with a speed of thirty knots an d capable of carrying 3,000 persons—1,000 salon passengers, 800 second cabin and 1,200 steerage passengers. The crew will number 1,000 officers and men. They will be the largest ships afloat, fifty feet longer than the Leviathan, which now holds the record. The Woolworth Building is the tallest in America, and yet the ships stood on end would reach 250 feet above that building. A new harbor is to be used at Ft. Pond Bay, Montauk Point, which will be 118 miles nearer Plymouth, England, than New York, and which will bring the time of the voyage under four days. They are to carry oil enough for a run of 7,000 miles, so that they will cross the Atlantic, and go right back again without replenishing the fuel. They are to have an inner and an outer skin, and compartments as nearly unsinkable as human skill can construct. Mail and express matter and passengers and baggage only are to be carried. There are to be winter gardens, ball rooms, Turkish baths, swimming pools, gymnasiums, grill rooms, moving picture shows, theaters, and a department store where any article desired may be purchased. The United States Navy is to have charge of the construction of these palatial racers of the seas. For 6,000 years until comparatively recently the best that could be done in sea navigation was with oar and sail. There is this reference to a sailing vessel carrying passengers: "And finding a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, we went aboard and set forth." (Acts 21 : 2.)

RAISING RICE IN CHINA



Paddy fields in South China in the spring planting season

THIS plain is estimated to be supporting about 4,000 people to the square mile. One must not draw the conclusion, however, from this that China itself is over-populated; indeed, quite the reverse is true. There are over-populated districts due to the congestion of people in certain fertile plains and river valleys. The great obstacle to a distribution of the population is the lack of communications. The approach to the solution of the Chinese problem of poverty lies in the development of roads and railways.

Roosevelt Forest Biological Station

IN MEMORY of Theodore Roosevelt a forest biological station has been established at the New York State College of Forestry at Syracuse. The station is to be devoted to the study of wild animal life. It is said to be the first of the kind in the world. It will be of great importance in the protection and conservation of game, and is a fitting memorial to the one who so loved the deep forests, and the big game God made to live in them. This memorial and others to be founded will teach the earthly immortality of a great and good man, thus expressed in Scripture. "He being dead yet speaketh." (Heb. 11 : 4.)

Proposes Talking to Mars

A PROFESSOR in a Massachusetts college is planning to go up 10,000 feet in an airplane and try and hold some kind of communication with the inhabitants of Mars. He is superintending the construction of his airship, and says he has an apparatus all made with which he will signal and talk to the people of the sister world. Some astronomers claim to have discovered mountains and rivers on that planet, and even canals dug by the inhabitants. Many think the professor is on a fool's errand, but so they did of the Wright brothers who proposed to fly like a bird, and of those who promised to talk across the sea without the use of wires. We do not expect the astronomer to talk with Mars except with his imagination, but it must not be thought that the limit has been reached in astronomical science, though such marvelous progress has been made. Man's greatness is the mastery of nature is set off in contrast to his littleness in the physical realm in these words of the inspired psalmist: "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" (Ps. 8 : 3, 4.)

Drastic Dry Bill

BY a vote of 287 to 100, or nearly three to one, the House of Representatives passed the drastic dry enforcement bill which will be adopted substantially by the Senate, and the tail of the liquor snake, which has been wiggling till the sun goes down, will be still forever. The last silly proposition to have the courts decide that 2.75 per cent. beer is permitted by the new law, vanished when the House declared that all drinks containing more than one half of one per cent. of alcohol were included in National Prohibition. The people were mighty sore on the saloon, and killed it. Science and big business were instruments in the destruction of the liquor traffic, but the church was the arm that did the execution, and out of her loyalty to Christ. "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." (1 John 3 : 8.)

SITTING ON THE WORLD

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE Great War has brought some extremely picturesque changes to the American language. In the last two years many new words have been added to the average vocabulary. The doughboy, with his vividly American sense of humor and his equally American power of description, has coined certain phrases to meet certain situations. And, because a great proportion of our population is made up of doughboys and the families of doughboys, their words and phrases have spread through the land as rapidly as a fire spreads through a dry forest.

"I'll tell the world," says your 1919 model American when he wishes to be emphatic. "I'll say so!" he asserts upon occasion. If things go wrong he shrugs his shoulders and remarks that he is "out of luck!" And so on.

The day I left Germany I drove to the railroad station with a good-looking non-com from lower New York. It was rather a wonderful morning and the sky was very blue, and the car hummed over the well-cared-for roads—German roads are not torn as French roads are torn. And all at once I felt a thrill with the joy of being alive and well and having the splendid years lying all before me, ready to be conquered.

I said something of the sort to the non-com. "Doesn't this kind of a day make you feel like a million dollars?" I questioned. "Doesn't it pull you to your toes, and snap your chin up, and make you want to laugh into the very face of the sun? That's what this kind of a day does to me."

The non-com chuckled at my enthusiasm; chuckled with the faintly condescending mirth of any man-person for any woman who tries to explain an emotion. But after a moment he answered me.

"Sure I know how you feel, miss," he said. "I'm sittin' on th' woild myself, this mornin'!"

"Sitting on the world," in the vernacular of the American Expeditionary Forces, means being just happy. Not just happy, either, but superlatively happy—so happy that nothing matters except the rose and gold of life. Troubles fade into insignificance when one is sitting on the world. Petty annoyances cease to be. Fear slides off into the dim background and hope takes its place.

ONCE, when I was a very little girl, I spent the summer in a mountain resort with my grandmother. She wrote at her desk in the mornings, but nearly every afternoon she went for a long drive through the very gorgeous country. And nearly always I was her silent and adoring companion. She used to talk to me gravely of many things that I, as gravely, listened to. And sometimes when she did not want to talk she would recite long poems that she knew by heart, and loved. And I, sitting by her side, would forget to watch the changing landscape, fascinated by the rhythmic swing of the lines that I often did not understand.

One afternoon while we were driving a storm came up all at once out of the brilliant summer sky. In the mountain country storms, though they come up very suddenly, are sometimes surprisingly fierce; so that the man who was driving us spoke apprehensively over his shoulder.

PEAKS

A STORM may rage in the world below,
  It may tear great trees apart;
But here on the mountain top, I know
  That it cannot touch my heart.

I have struggled up through the lightning's glare,
  I have walked where the cliffs fell sheer
To a gorge below but I breathed a prayer,
  And my soul passed doubt and fear!

Here on the mountain top the air
  Is clear as a silver song;
And the sun is warm on my unbound hair;
  And what though the way was long?

What though the way was steep and bleak,
  And what though the road was hard?
I stand at last on the mountain peak,
  With my eyes upraised to God!

A storm may sweep through the world below,
  It may rend great rocks apart;
But here on the crest of the world I know
  That it cannot touch my heart.

"There's no shelter anywheres around here," he said, "but we're on the side of a mountain now, an' if we go on up a wee bit higher we'll be out o' th' worst of it."

My grandmother was wrapping a carriage robe about me to protect me from the rain that was beginning to splash down. But she seemed to understand the driver, for she answered him pleasantly. I, being a very little child, could not help wondering why going up a wee bit higher would take us out of the worst of it. Going up higher, I reasoned, would have a quite opposite effect—would, in fact, bring us nearer to the black, threatening clouds that were gathering across the sky. Going up higher would make us come just so much nearer to the rain—and to the lightning that would follow the rain. But I had an infinite faith in my grandmother, so I snuggled close to her and fixed my round eyes upon the top of the mountain.

When the black threatening clouds had crept around the sky, the storm broke with the vigor of all mountain storms. The first patter of the rain drops became a blinding torrent and the sky seemed to break in two as a blinding flash of lightning zigzagged across it. I hid my eyes against my grandmother's shoulder and shivered as a crash of thunder followed the lightning.

I do not know how long I kept my eyes covered—how long it was before I heard the driver saying, "Don't be scared, little girl; it's all right now!"

I raised my head timidly, for I could still hear the crashing of the thunder. I raised my head, and rubbed my eyes with small doubled-up fists. And then—then I saw a marvelous picture that I shall never forget.

Our carriage had stopped on the top of the mountain and the tired horses were panting gratefully. They stood in a path of sunlight—radiant yellow sunlight that painted the world in a glory of color. But, as I leaned out over the side of the carriage, I saw that the storm was still raging below us—saw that the rain was falling and that the lightning darted venomously here and there. And as I watched, scarcely believing my eyes, I heard again the rumble of the thunder.

"Grandmother!" I said when I could at last find my voice. "Grandmother! I don't understand!"

My grandmother laughed at my quite evident bewilderment.

"Dear child," she answered, "we've gone beyond the storm. We're at the top of the mountain now. And the top of the mountain is above the clouds. The storm comes from the clouds, and so, because we're above them, it cannot harm us."

I sat there quietly in the carriage and looked down into another world—a world of blowing trees and dreary rain and blasting thunder. I sat there on what seemed to me the top of the world—sat there in the sunlight and looked down into the heart of the storm. And as I sat there I found myself wondering, with small-girl logic, why I had allowed the storm to frighten me. Surely one shouldn't allow oneself to get frightened at something that could be left behind! Surely a storm that one could drive through—that one could drive out of—wasn't a very important storm. There, on the mountain tops, I learned a rather wonderful lesson.

Sitting on the world—yes, it's slang! And slang is not to be recommended. But for a while, at least, soldier slang will have its place in the hearts and the homes of the American people. And when a phrase carries the weight of optimism that "sitting on the world" carries, there is something very worth while in it—even if it is slang.

There isn't a storm in life that can't be driven through, there isn't a trouble in the world that can't be left behind, if one has the strength of mind and will to drive to the summit of the mountain and sit up on the top of the world. It's hard, very often, to drive fearlessly through a storm, for lightning is terrifying, and thunder makes a frightful sound. Sometimes it's hard not to sink down beside the road and cover your eyes and let the rain fall over your bent form—sometimes it's unbelievably hard to keep going.

But, if you do keep going, you'll come in, time, to the mountain top. And then, all at once, you'll know that you've gone beyond fear. And as you look down into the storm that is sweeping below you, you'll find yourself wondering why it ever scared you. For when you come to the top of the mountain you'll be sitting on the world. And, in a sense, you'll be a conqueror!

Milad will always be lean and cadaverous looking, but he is a greatly changed boy since he was fed and doctored and set at light work in our garden. We who remember him in his long, much-too-large greatcoat, his small head tied up in a dirty rag, and looking for all the world like a sick woman, hardly recognize the strong hands and the bronzed face of our general factotum.

Last and perhaps least of our list of made-overs is the lame Suliman. Long fasting and a serious fall have made him a permanent cripple, I fear, and he had settled down to the idea that the best way for him to make his living was to sit by the roadside and accept the stray pennies of those charitably inclined. But the Red Cross people thought there was a better way. He was invited in one rainy day and shown how toys could be cut from cardboard and made to move their heads and legs by pinning them on with office clips. He was not slow to grasp the idea, and though he was not very quick with his hands and our simple tools he did have the trader's instinct, and made good bargains with the children who were attracted by his wares. One day he asked for a piece of paper to wrap his treasures in for transportation to the street corner. I gave him two or three pages of an old New York Times. What was my delight later in the day to find that our merchant had not only disposed of the toys, but had even sold the ancient news for about the same price it cost on Fifth Avenue six weeks ago. After this we let him have all the old papers that came our way, the pictures from the Sunday editions, and other bits of small value to any but the toy merchant. Then he discovered that he could make spindles from spools and sticks. Now he has gone home to his own village. I wonder why—but I am pretty sure that he has a new idea, and that he has found in himself a latent talent that will enable him to earn his living and keep him from ever being a common mendicant.

Practical Christian Unity

By
REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

PRACTICAL demonstration of Christian unity has been made in Buffalo, that shows how such unity can exist and does exist, though very may be said about it. Indeed, one encouraging about this matter is that this unity, as exhibited ffalo, will in large measure be taken for granted.

e demonstration to which I refer is the Biennial national and Interdenominational Christian Enr Conference. To this meeting came some ands of young men and women, representing ically every evangelical denomination in the d States and Canada. Though not a World's ention this year, sympathetic greetings were ed from many lands and many denominations the seas.

one could tell by looking at the audience to what nination the different groups belonged. No one guess from the addresses made in which parr regiment of the Lord's army the speakers ed. No sectarian word was uttered, while at the time all the young people present have gone with a more eager determination than they before known to serve the Master as best they hrough their own churches and denominations. ile ecclesiastics have been talking about unity passing resolutions about it, and some have been ng the Pope and asking for recognition in his a request which he politely but firmly refused, ns of young Christians in this and other lands, ut talking much about it, have come together this simple credo:

rusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, mise him that I will strive to do whatever he d like to have me do."

e essential part of their covenant is only twentyvords long, but it is long enough to bind the hearts ung Christians together in ever-growing numbers ever-heightening devotion.

hen a world survey of Christian Endeavor for convention was taken, it was seen that the odists lead (though not in this country) in the ber of Endeavorers, as in so many other good that the Presbyterians come next, the sts next, the Disciples next, then the Reformed and the Congregationalists and Lutherans some hundred of other denominations or subions of denominations.

why emphasize these divisions, when the e heart unity of all Christians here finds expres- At other times the peculiar tenets of the minations, their honored leaders, their noble history and achievements, may well be dwelt upon; but at such a convention as the one in Buffalo, and at hundreds of others which I have attended in almost every country in the world, this is the motto and innermost thought of these gatherings:

"One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren."

That this idea has compelling power with Christian young people of the present generation in whatever land they live, is shown by the latest reports which have come from Endeavor forces in all the world. In spite of the war and the enlistment of three hundred thousand Endeavorers, the movement has grown stronger during these years of world struggle and turmoil.

In Great Britain, whose religious and social life was hit so much harder than our own, important advance steps have been taken by the Endeavorers, and a recent national convention in London was in many respects the most encouraging of any in the long series.

Even from Germany, though no direct reports have come, we learn through Switzerland that the number of societies has largely increased within five years.

In Jugoslavia a beginning has already been made, and the first state Christian Endeavor convention will soon be held.

In India the societies have increased to more than 2,000, and in China to over 1,200, while Japan has doubled the number of its societies within three years.

South American and Mexican Endeavorers are organizing their forces as never before.

In our own country the state conventions of the year show an unusual advance in numbers and interest. Many of them numbered their paid registered delegates by thousands. Ohio registered over 4,000 delegates, and California over 5,000.

Christian Endeavor is no new thing. It is not the novelty of the idea that brings young Christians together in ever-increasing numbers for a purely religious gathering. I venture to say that two words account for such meetings and for the movement as a whole, and these two words are loyalty and fellowship; loyalty to Jesus Christ and his Church, fellowship with all who love him.

An illustration of this loyalty and fellowship, which I have never forgotten, occurred some years ago at a great state Christian Endeavor convention in Melbourne, Australia. The large city hall was crowded with 3,000 delegates for the consecration meeting, and to show their loyalty the Endeavorers sat together as denominations, to give their responses when the roll of denominations was called. In those days there were five divisions of Methodists in Australia—Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, Free Methodists, Methodist Protestants, and Bible Christians, now all happily joined in one great United Methodist Church.

One after another the groups of young people arose and gave together their consecration message, or sang their song of devotion—the Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples and Anglicans; then the smaller bodies of Methodists, each group singing or speaking by itself. Then, last, a large body of Wesleyan Methodists, six or eight hundred strong, arose and sang together the first hymn that Charles Wesley wrote after his conversion, beginning,

> "O for a thousand tongues to sing
> My dear Redeemer's praise."

They sang the first, second, and third verses all by themselves. Then they began on the fourth verse;

> "He breaks the power of canceled sin," and the Presbyterians began to sing:

> "He sets the captive free," and the Church of England young people joined in:

> "His blood can make the foulest clean," and the Baptists could not refrain:

> "His blood availed for me," and all were singing. This hymn of personal experience and devotion was too big for any one denomination, for it was the universal expression of the Christian heart. This is the experience which brings together in spirit, if not in person, the millions of Endeavors of many tongues and tribes in all the world.

I rejoice in the splendid efforts of the Christian Herald in promoting through its most widely read and interesting columns the absolutely essential cause of Christian Unity, and feel sure that the hearts of the young Christians of this and future generations will respond to its efforts to fulfil our Lord's prayer that "they all may be one."

TO MAKE THE WORLD SAFE

THE world is counting up its war losses. They aggregate the tremendous total of 7,450,200 killed. Cost in heart-beats and pulse-throbs unknown.

The school of great ideals is ever baptized in blood. Liberty is the nectar of God brewed in the vats of vicarious suffering from the tears of humanity. Civilization and progress are marked by Calvaries. Tattered battle-flags, ragged regimentals and broken men are the things that make for emancipations.

Patriotism at staggering sacrifice has made the world safe for democracy. Now Religion must make democracy safe for the world.

This too will demand a tremendous toll of men and money. This too will demand its heart-throbs and pulse-beats.

A second world war is to be waged. Mighty battles will be fought and splendid heroisms manifested when we get a new conception of the glory of Christian duty. Missionary effort, evangelical endeavor and Gospel propaganda call for sacrificial living, self-forgetfulness, hardship, cross-bearing. Such a program is the grand and solemn Amen to the petition "Thy kingdom come." The opportunity and the privilege are ours. The bugle has sounded. The summons to the ideal has come. The challenge to combat has been hurled.

May we, as Christian men and women, be true to the call, faithful to the Gospel and brave in its preaching, teaching and living. Let us forget our Churchianity and give the world more Christianity.

The world sorely needs organization, but not so sorely as it needs inspiration. The true inspiration is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Consistent Christian lives are the medium. Victory over all evil is the promise to those who will endure to the end. The slogan of the next half-century must be "Like a mighty army moves the Church of God."

"LEAD, KINDLY LIGHT"

"THIS song means anything that any one chooses to have it mean, be he Christian, Pantheist or Buddhist."

Thus does a distinguished theologian seek to dispose of this good old hymn, favorite in college chapels, inspiration to the young, balm to the aged, joy of the living, consolation of the dying, and requiem for the dead.

This argument against "Lead, Kindly Light" is the strongest possible one in its favor.

A God of love, of mercy, of forgiveness sheds his kindly light for all, and it steadily leads to the higher life, the more perfect brotherhood.

"Lead, Kindly Light" is universal in its appeal. Wherever a child of earth wanders from the right, whenever his heart is weighted with sorrow, then from the gloom and wretchedness goes up a cry for help and guidance, an appeal for light.

Let us be glad that we have a song whose infinite sweetness expresses a common human feeling, a common progress, a common salvation.

Let us rejoice that the men of all nations can join hands around the world and together lift their eyes and their voices to the "Kindly Light."

BRAINS AND BRAWN

HISTORY is constantly repeating itself. In their day, Rome and Greece led the world in education and in the development of the arts and sciences. In later times the great universities of Europe have been regarded as the high-water mark of culture and the makers of national character.

Four years of depletion have changed educational conditions abroad. It is now believed that with united effort on the part of our colleges and seminaries, this republic can step to the front as the leading educational center of the globe. With immense resources at the disposal of our universities and seminaries, and with the opportunity calling us to such an effort, we may expect with the next few years to witness a very general movement in that direction.

Many new problems have been the legacy of the war, not the least among them being the inequality of income of trained professionals in contrast with that of the man who works with his hands. It is shown by statistics that the wages of tradesmen and mechanics, and even of unskilled labor, are today the highest ever known. They exceed by from 50 to 100 per cent. those paid to trained men in many of the professions. This amazing inequality is now being studied by the Harvard Summer School, which is raising a large fund to be used in making education "more effective in the life of the nation," and to assure a reasonable income to university professors and class teachers. It is pointed out that the motorman gets sixty cents an hour, while a professor averages eighteen cents. In our schools, colleges, and seminaries the average salary of a highly trained teacher and professor, in all but the highest grades, is less by half than the wage of the riveter, painter, smith or even the factory hand and the milk-wagon driver. We even hear of preachers who have laid aside gown and book and taken up the pick and shovel. At a recent meeting in aid of the New Era Movement, Dr. Charles H. Butler, of Buffalo, told of a Southern pastor who had not had a new suit of clothes in seventeen years, but had worn cast-offs, while even the humblest member in his congregation fared better than the dominie did.

Looking at such examples, one might almost be led to conclude that the greater the service the less the world pays for it. But society owes it to itself and to the individual to apply the remedy. Such disparities cannot continue. They are largely the outcome of inflated conditions, and when inflation ends the inequalities between the rewards of muscle and trained service will be ironed out to more reasonable proportions and a better balance established.

Labor has a powerful advantage in its efficient organization, which has lifted it up financially step by step. Until lately, professionalism has held itself aloof from organization; but there is now a tendency to recognize the principle that union for a common purpose yields a power which is well-nigh invincible.

THE SALOON STILL OPEN

IT IS said that though a snake's head be crushed its tail will not die until sundown.

Whether true of all snakes or not, it is proving to be true of the saloons.

To the amazement and disgust of the law-respecting public majority, many saloons in the big cities and in some of the smaller ones continue to live right on. In utter defiance of the war-time Prohibition act, they are openly selling "2.75 per cent." beer and "light" wines, and what all they are selling surreptitiously may be easily guessed.

The plea that "beer containing only 2.75 per cent. of alcohol is not intoxicating" finds its prompt answer in the common-sense fact that if it were not intoxicating it would not be drunk. Surely nobody not of depraved taste would like it for its flavor or its smell. Few wines, however "light," carry less than 10 per cent. alcohol, and most of them contain far more.

This open violation of the spirit and letter of the law, under official tolerance, "until the courts decide whether 2.75 per cent. beer is intoxicating," would be a ludicrous farce were it not fraught with the shameful tragedy of contempt for public decency, the pollution of public office and the corruption of manhood.

Let no one serenely imagine that Prohibition has been won by the mere enactment of law. The fight for its enforcement has only begun so long as the saloon exists.

The saloon is not only a defiant law-breaker, but it is the breeding-place, the rallying-point, the center of organization of all the opposition to Prohibition.

The first real step toward real Prohibition must be the suppression of the saloon.

THE RACE RIOTS

FIRST in the National Capital, then in the metropolis of the Middle West, unreasoning passion brought race riots. The immediate responsibility for the riots appears about equally divided between whites and blacks. But the ultimate responsibility for the breach of order lies with the white man.

The negro has suffered much and in the main silently. He has even been happy under adverse conditions and has done his part of the world's work well. The whites, superior in influence, superior in the main in education and opportunity, must show themselves superior in self-control and in the support of order and even-handed justice.

In Washington mobs of whites, using reported assaults as a pretext, began indiscriminate attacks on any man wearing a black skin, and the negroes were quick to meet violence with violence. In Chicago negroes lured north for war time jobs, herded into inadequate houses, facing a serious unemployment situation now the white men are coming home, were not in a temper to accept insults. And the whites, resentful because of "invasions" of white districts by prosperous negroes buying homes, were antagonistic. The tinder was ready on both sides and the spark was not lacking. Hotheads and criminals were quickly gathered into mobs, the hotheads to avenge the grievance they could not have formulated but which fed on wild tales of the atrocities of t side, the crooks to take advantage of the di plunder and rob. And so the peace was bro the militia had to be called to mend it, and people died, as usual.

As Christian citizens, we must fight, brother black man, but the inequalities and ties to which he is now subjected. We must he has schools equal to ours, opportunity as any, equal wages for equal work, and the same justice we crave for the white man when he is court. The test both of our faith and our cit may well lie in our treatment of the man of blood whose American birth attests his citizen our obligation.

The Gospel of the Other Side

By REV. BRUCE S. WRIGHT*

T—I Cor. 13 : 12. "For now we see through a darkly; but then face to face: now we know in ut then shall we know even as also we are known."

HE mirrors of Paul's day were not glass, as our mirrors; they were metal. The best mirrors were made of silver. How costly they must have been! How few of the apostle's could possess them! Even the best mirrors mewhat imperfect and uneven. When we re- reflections we have seen in polished metal, we ze the aptness of these words, "Now we see a mirror, darkly."

things are spoken of in this verse, dim sight ll sight; partial knowledge and complete dge. Now and then are the words used. Now through a glass, darkly; then face to face: now w in part; then shall we know even as also we own. The halting, hesitating now is balanced iumphant then.

ack full sight and complete knowledge. We nder limitations. There are the limitations of ment. The man who was born in a small vil- ho went to school there, who took up his work ent all his life in that one village, is not to be for his provincialism; it is the limitation of ment. It is equally true of the city-dweller. are thousands of people in every large city who ittle if anything, about other parts of their city, e other parts of the world. There are men and on the Bowery, New York; who do not know entral Park is like. I am depressed when I stand bridge spanning the Pasig River and watch scos tied to the banks or going up or down eam, and think that people are born, live and those boats; that there are families which for tions have not known anything of life outside of those cascos, plying monotonously up and the river. We see through a mirror, darkly; ow only in part, because we labor under the ion of environment.

e are the limitations of knowledge. We could ter informed if we would. Some one has said, re of the man of one book." The apostle said, one thing I do." It is well to be a man of one ne task, one race; to know and be able to do ing. It is better to be a man of many books, tasks, to desire to know about people and outside oneself. We are favored; we have e environment we once knew; not that this en- ent is better than the old—probably it is not d—but the change has enabled us to grow in dge of other lands and other peoples. Yet it is e for one to journey round the world and be vincial as when he left. All of which leads me theme—there is a gospel of the other side. It gospel that I plead. I want to suggest four things , there is the other side to every event. The rote,

"The inner side of every cloud
Is bright and shining;
I therefore turn my clouds about
And always wear them inside out
To show the lining."

EVENTS are like clouds. They have two sides. Many a time if we could only see the other side of an event we would learn that like the cloud it has a silver lining. When Lincoln was assassinated, men said, "What a dark cloud! There can be no bright side to this!" As the days passed, men began to glimpse the other side. They saw that his death, as nothing else possibly could, softened men's hearts, North and South; cruel words, harsh sentiments were suppressed; hatred gave way to love; his death, more than many victories, indissolubly joined our nation. Your life has been filled with many events; how they crowded upon you! Some of them seemed dark, hopelessly dark; but every event has another side; look for the other side. Now you have learned to say, "All events work together for good to them that love God."

There is the other side to every question. The air is full of questions, political, religious, economic, social, and to each one there is another side. To read one set of papers one would think there is but one side to the political question, that side. To read the other papers, one finds there is but one side there too; ah, but this time it is the other side. There is one side to the Philippine question; and there is another side. In religion this doctrine must be upheld, this and no other, we are informed. Then some one becomes equally insistent that another doctrine is the one essential to salvation. Bishop Ussher of Boston writes in a recent article on "Religious Partisanship": "As I see the condition, church partisanship has had its day, and it is time a hungry world should be spiritually fed on something better than religious husks." Now, I am not pleading that one should be a political coward, a social nonenity, or a religious neutral. I am asking that we do not announce ourselves with too great positiveness; that we guard against partiality until we have seen the other side of the question, until we have held it open to catch all the light there is.

Phillips Brooks asks, "Is not all positiveness of necessity partiality? To say, 'This is true, I know it,' and to leave no room for the limitations and qualifications we cannot know, for all those outside influences of unseen truth which we must be working on and drawing from this fact that we have found—is there not some folly here? Is not the true wisdom something like this: I know, so far as it goes, this truth is sacredly and wholly true; but that very truth forbids me to believe that it has not developments and ramifications reaching far out into the universe of associated truth with which it is connected. Now I know, and I prize my knowledge as the gift of God, and hold it sacred; but 'I know in part,' I wait until 'that which is in part shall be done away.'"

THEN there is the other side to every life. The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table said to his assembled guests: "It is not easy, at the best, for two persons talking together to make the most of each other's thoughts, there are so many persons present." The people about the table were amazed; they wanted an explanation. The Autocrat went on to explain:

"When John and Thomas, for instance, are talking together, it is natural that among the six there should be more or less confusion." The people thought the Autocrat had suddenly gone mad. The landlady turned pale. The old gentleman opposite thought the Autocrat might seize the carving-knife. But he went on calmly to explain that at the fewest six personalities are distinctly to be recognized as taking part in the dialogue between John and Thomas. "There is first, the real John, known only to his Maker; second, John's ideal John, never the real one and often unlike him; third, Thomas's ideal John, never the real John, nor John's John. Similarly, there are three Thomases. I may know you very well, but there is a side to your life I do not know, I cannot know, and may never know."

So there is another side to every life. If we could know the other side to some lives, what heroes and heroines would be created out of the common folk who walk with us day by day; and what scamps and rogues would sometimes be revealed among those who pass as respectable, high-minded people! Did not Christ have this in mind when he said, "Judge not, that ye be not judged"? For how difficult it is to know the other side of those lives.

LASTLY, there is the other side to life itself. Some years ago, in St. Paul's Cathedral, Canon Henry P. Liddon told the story of an army officer who retired and returned to end his days in his home country. One day he was talking with his friends about some of the most thrilling experiences he had known in the far countries where he had seen service. He told of skirmishes, sieges, personal encounters, hair-breadth escapes, reverses, victories. The group was held spell-bound by his recital. At last he paused, with the observation, "I expect to see something much more remarkable than anything I have been describing." He was seventy years of age, and retired; they did not quite catch his meaning. Then in a quiet voice he said, "I mean the first five minutes after death." There is another side to life itself. How we plan, how we worry, how we wear ourselves out, as though this were all of life! This is but one side; the larger side is the other.

Now we see through a mirror, darkly; then face to face: now we know in part; then shall we know even as also we are known. The now is balanced by a then; the here by a there; this side by another side. To see clearly, to know fully, to reach our perfected manhood and womanhood, we must include all life, all truth, all love—we must live the Gospel of the Other Side.

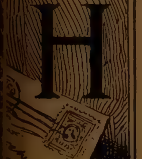
THE BEST ERRAND BOY—A Sermon for Young Folks

By REV. S. EDWARD YOUNG, D.D., Pastor Bedford Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, New York City



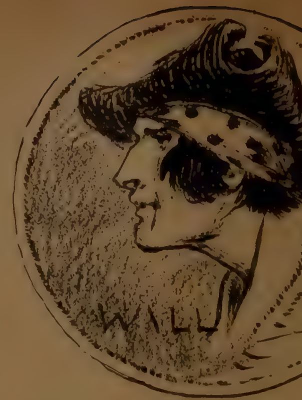
HERE is the best errand-boy. Do you know, he is never out of sorts. Never says he is tired. Never whines, "Why can't somebody else do it?" Never talks back. Almost never loses what I give him. Always goes as fast as anybody could. Always costs less than any other. Why, he will go from here to San Francisco, and then over two thousand miles to Honolulu, and there he will deliver what I have handed him, and I pay him less than the price of a good lead pencil—not so as it costs to ride one block on a street car. rand-boy will go for me clear into Africa and camel and ride as far as the camel goes, and then get on the back of a man so black that a piece of charcoal would nearly make a white mark on him, and keep on going till he places in a missionary's hands what I send.

How does this errand-boy do this? Well, he works with lots of other errand-boys, all of them following the best rules and each doing his part just right and every one helping each other all he can. When I give this errand-boy anything he goes into a green box and then into a kind of a sack and with a whole lot of other errand-boys is tumbled on to a table and then tossed into a sack and then hauled in a truck and then whizzed along on a train; and if I want him to go to a little town along the railroad he is pitched off in a sack as the train rushes on; but if he is going to Honolulu or Africa, he stays on the train and at the ocean takes the first steamer.

Some people like to have homes for these little errand-boys from all countries. There they are in the home, which is usually a kind of book. They have come from many far-away places and have some strange faces. Some of their faces look like King George's, some like King Emmanuel's, some like King Albert's. This errand-boy's face looks like George Washington's. Some of these George Washington-looking ones have gone to France without taking anything over, but have come back bringing letters from our soldier boys. Now you know that the name of this errand-boy is Postage Stamp. I do not know whether the name of this one is Johnny or Billy; but I rather think it is Sammy. Now you know that the way to get the most wonderful things done is to work with other boys and girls who try to do good things and to follow the best rules and to do each your best. Which are the very best errands? God's errands—the things he wants done. What was it Jesus said when he was a little boy? "I must be about my Father's business." So should we.

Which are the best rules? God's rules, written in his Book. Let us learn them better every day. Which part should we do? Just the part that belongs to you; just taking God's message where you can. Splendid! Each of you God's errand-boy or girl, going with his message, working with others who do the same.

SILENT WOLF



Written and Illustrate

REMINGTON SCHUYLER

"BOG TROTTER" clung to his bark perch with difficulty. He teetered and balanced with twitching wings and tail, sinking his sharp talons deeper and deeper into the pad on Silent Wolf's shoulder.

Since long before midday the Indian boy, with his pet hawk, had been jogging down the trail from the "Highlands." While still some distance from the "Wading Place" (ford) a storm had swept up from the Sound. From a break in the forest Silent Wolf had seen the sparkling blue waters go suddenly green, then deepen to black. The wind died among the trees. In the strange stillness all animal life seemed suddenly snuffed out. His pet hawk, huddled low on his shoulder, whistled in a complaining sort of way. Only the slight swishing sound of moccasined feet among the pine-needles broke the silence.

The trees shone stark and watery against the oncoming blackness of the storm. The wind came tumbling through the woods, lashing the mighty pines and spruces to fury. Great dry branches rattled down. Pine-needles showered the running boy. Dead leaves swirled about in curious eddies lifting in dancing columns.

Hail and blinding rain, such as seldom chanced, beat through the trees. Of a sudden tiny rivulets along the trail became brooks. Brooks spouted into muddy streams. Like distant growling there came the dull booming of the river. Great boulders loosened and were hurled down stream. It sounded above the mighty roaring of the wind and rain. The earth seemed to tremble with the concussions.

Night—and the storm howling even more loudly—had come when he reached the Wading Place. The trail ended abruptly in a slather of mud and fiercely rushing rapids. Lightning flashes showed great branches and trees swirling along in the swollen torrent. The almost continuous crashes of thunder and the grumbling jar of the boulders deafened him. The Wading Place was impossible.

He went up stream to where the high banks pinched the river closer. A great hemlock leaned shakily far out over the water. Its topmost branches cradled themselves in a mighty beech on the other shore. Aided by the flickering light, Silent Wolf crept out along the rough trunk. He held fast to the branches, moving cautiously. The wind beat about him, swaying his shaky foot-bridge perilously.

Almost in the safety of the beech tops there came a sudden flash and crash. They seemed as one. The forest flared behind him. His fingers slipped from their hold. A branch caught at his shoulder—ripped at the thong and swept bird and perch and lashing off into the night. Another flash, and he saw the hawk wildly fluttering in the racing stream a hundred feet below.

So swift was Silent Wolf's descent, he almost fell as he scurried down out of the giant beech. Racing along the sheer bank, he called and whistled loudly. The breath was whipped out of his mouth and lost in the confusion of sound. "Bog Trotter" didn't answer. Though he searched long he found no trace.

Cold, shivering and forlorn he came to the trail again and slushed on through the mud. He reached his grandfather's old abandoned rock shelter.

It was a fine dry cave of two rooms. The gaping entrance had been partially closed with large flat slabs of stone. Some half-decayed stockades broke the force of the wind.

As he crawled inside, a great gray animal pushed by him, knocking him headlong. Drawing his knife he peered into the darkness. Three successive flashes revealed nought else save the familiar interior with its litter of shells, flint chips and broken wood.

From among the dry wood he selected a rotten piece which crumbled to dust as he picked it up. With flint and steel he set to work. Finally he got a slight spark caught in the wood dust. Bit by bit he nursed it to a glowing ember, which he blew into a tiny flame.

From behind him a sudden growl and rush of feet startled him to action. He swung about with bared knife, slashing the gloom. Only the darkness of the night and the forest lit with flashes greeted his keen lookings.

This happened twice. Then he managed to get the fire started. It drove back the oppressive shadows. He added to it till it was a great roaring blaze. The cavern glowed redly. Now he felt safer. With a splintered pine knot he explored the recesses of the outer room; then the inner chamber. Within its low portal he crawled warily. Turkey bones and feathers and bits of fur and refuse cluttered the entrance. In a far corner, like tiny puppies, a litter of fox-kits whimpered and strove to claw through the stone wall behind them.

So it was the old mother fox he had surprised when he came crawling in to dispute with her the possession of this shelter. He laughed at the queer antics of the little fellows.

Much heartened, he returned to the fire. He gathered all the wood that lay about. There was enough, he thought, to last till daylight. Manitou, the Great Spirit, was very good to him.

While he dried his leggins, he scratched around and found some flint knives and arrow tips that lay partly hidden in the dust. His grandfather had been noted for the perfection of his flint work. There were many choice pieces which an ordinary worker would have thought quite fine. One in particular—a long fine black blade with an edge keener than the palefaces' knives, he selected.

He carefully smoothed out the featherin arrows. Even more carefully he dried his b

Very curious were these an-oukies (Yankees).

It was more curious still that at one of the white en's castles, which lay at the wading place on Black og Brook, they even paid wampum or goods in trade or wolf heads. The winter before, Silent Wolf had rapped eight gray fellows and five whelps, and delivered the heads, keeping the furs. He felt quite ich in goods.

One other thing he couldn't quite understand was why his father seemed to prefer living in the castles of he palefaces on Manahattan. For though he worked t lifting great pots and kettles off the fires for the women and split up much wood, in return all he got was a place to sleep under the stoop and some curious ood to eat. Once in a while he was given some strange strong water, which made him talk as foolish as the white men.

Trotting along the trail Silent Wolf marshaled all the arguments to tell his father. He would count out all the wampum he had hidden away in a secret place in the beech swamp.

He would say, "Hear, my father. Here in these woods of the old Sagamore Shippa you are still a free hunter. See the many strings of wampum I have found the past winter in the woods by slaying wolves and trapping beaver. Let be the white man's strange drink. It is spoiling your eye and making your arm unsteady." So he would say to his father as he showed him the rich pelts and belts of beads.

Once his father had been a mighty hunter—a far-fighter. That was before the Yan-oukies came into the woods from the north and bought all this great hunting-ground from his people—for some iron kettles and hoes and a scarlet shirt or two. The Siwanoys had been rich, for at that time all the women made wampum and the beavers were plenty in all the streams.

Red Bird, Silent Wolf's mother, had excelled all others at wampum-making. And her jars of pottery were more durable and had a finer look than the other women's.

Then one day, more than ten winters before, the Mohawks had swept down to the very gates of Shippa's town. They harried the outlying rock shelters and carried off Red Bird and some others. All the far-fighters of the tribe had hounded them up the great river of the Naked Bear (Hudson), slaying several.

But their strange canoe of birch bark was fleeter than the heavy dugouts of his kinsmen. So they escaped, keeping well out to the middle of the river.

Some winters later a tribesman, whom they had carried away when he was but a small boy, escaped and returned. He brought word that Red Bird still lived, having been adopted into the Mohawks' tribe. They called her "She-makes-the-wampum," because whenever bits of shell were brought to her she would quickly convert them into beads. She was also noted for her baskets—so craftily woven they held water like a pottery vessel.

A number of times his father Runs Foaming had tried to penetrate the enemy's country northward, in search of Red Bird. He had barely escaped with his life. Then he had become discouraged and lost interest and began going to the white men's castles and using their strong drink.

So Silent Wolf mused as he ran along the winding trail. His mind filled with great undertakings. Perhaps now his father would go with him on an expedition into the Mohawks' country. He bounded gaily into the beech woods that surrounded his father's shelter at Great Rock.

The silvery bark of the beeches reflected the sky until the whole woodland seemed enchanted. Tiny saplings gleamed white and phantom-like. The moist earth smelt fresh and good. Here and there blue-and-white flowers peeped from among their wax-like leaves. Wintergreen berries shone redly among the fronds of the ferns.

The close-packed trail was firm and springy under foot. The long miles dropped swiftly behind. The path clung to the tops of the rocky ridges, winding and curling like the brook that followed it.

Great bleaching shell-heaps showed among the forest mold, marking the old camp sites of the tribesmen. It was a glorious day.

Of a sudden a noise broke out. It rattled away through the woods. Flocks of scarlet and yellow birds flew up. Woodpeckers ceased hammering. A rabbit bobbed over the hilltop and whisked away and was gone.

Then another and another noise shattered the peaceful woods. It was the "thunder-sticks" (guns) of the palefaces.

Then Runs Foaming's war-whoop came ringing through the woods.

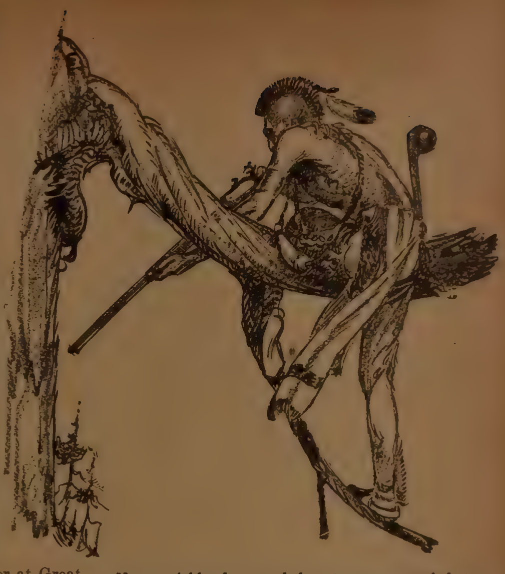
Silent Wolf had vanished behind a great beech at the first shot. Swiftly he broke his bow from its case and bent it, notching an arrow. He slipped two others between his spare fingers as a reserve. Only a keen-eyed observer could have seen that lithe, shadowy form flit from tree to tree. As his father's war-whoop faded thinly away into the woods he left his shelter and dashed through the trees forgetful of himself.

From the hill-top overlooking Great Rock he saw a curious one-sided battle among the rocks and saplings of the open glade. The sheer face of Great Rock Shelter protected the defenders from the rear. A tiny stream of water trickled over the rock and fell splashing near the cave entrance. A wall of flat stones and bark tied to poles partially closed the opening. A lightning-riven pine lay sprawled about ten paces from the wall. Broken shards of pottery and old bones and shells lay scattered on the hill that sloped gently down to the brook. On the near side of the little stream boulders and saplings and roots and trunks of a half rotten "windfall" afforded good shelter to the attacking party. Arrows stuck into the ground in queer angles all about the cave mouth and the fallen pine. They looked like porcupine quills. His father must have been surprised near the pine and have run for the cave at the first attack.

There was a sudden puff of smoke from the cave. It was followed by a long bang, which clattered back and forth against the rocky cliff. Off in the woods to the right a dusky figure half rose, stumbled forward and lay quiet. Runs Foaming's war-whoop swept the woods again.

Looking closely, Silent Wolf picked out the reddish bodies of the attacking party lost among the yellow beech leaves and the mossy stones.

He counted nine Mohawks below him and to the right. They were loosing arrows, although beside several of them he made out long slender thunder-sticks. Either they had no magic powder to make them thunder, or else they feared bringing down on them the palefaces who lived just beyond the great woods westward.



Very quickly he crawled out on a gnarled tree that overhung the precipice. Some ten feet out he steadied himself and took careful aim at something below

As he peered anxiously about trying how to best serve his father, he perceived an enemy slip from behind a tree and edge around to the right. Twice Silent Wolf saw him shift. How he wished he could signal his father, because this new move threatened to outflank him. A third time the painted warrior flitted. His father's thunder-stick clamored again. The Mohawk lay still.

So intent were the besiegers that Silent Wolf came into the open glade. In full view of the cave he stood there undecided whether to risk racing to the cave or running on to Eastchester for help.

He whistled like a hawk. On the second time a hand appeared over the breastwork for a fleeting second. It was swiftly withdrawn. A shower of arrows struck and splintered where it had been. Thrice it appeared and three times it drew the arrow shower. But Silent Wolf had read the signals. He sheathed his bow and vanished like a mist in the woodland. He was not a moment too soon. A Mohawk had read the gestures and was slipping off through the woods to intercept him.

He circled widely southward, gaining the trail again. As he broke into a dead run a tomahawk whizzed past his top-knot and struck clanging into a dead tree. Two arrows grazed his shoulder as he slipped on a bit of clayey ground. Naturally a fleet runner, these tokens of the Mohawks added wings to his flying heels as he sped toward the settlements. From time to time he caught the faint rattle of the thunder-sticks. Once his father's war-cry came thinly down the wind. He knew all was still well at the cave.

But the palefaces would not believe him. Only a lad named Will Pinckney, whom Silent Wolf had played with years ago, would credit the tale. A large boastful man came out, who had a great red nose. He talked a lot of words. Silent Wolf understood that he meant it was only a ruse to get the settlers away from their homes. Then he said the pesky varmints would swoop down on the unprotected cabins, burning and pillaging and running their neat cattle and swine off into the woods.

He advised all to bring in their families and beasts to the security of the stockades and to prepare for an attack. As a measure of precaution he told some to grab Silent Wolf for a hostage.

All this time the Indian had been struggling to keep back his

THE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEEK

Railroad Wages and the High Cost of Living

FEDERAL purchase of the nation's railway systems by the issuance of bonds, control of the properties by a management committee of fifteen—five named by the President, five by the operating officials, and five by the employees—and diversion to employees of half the profits of operation, comprise the main features of a bill introduced in the house on August 2 by Representative T. W. Sims, Democrat, of Tennessee. The bill was prepared and introduced at the request of the "Big Four" Railway Brotherhoods, backed by the railway division of the American Federation of Labor.

The measure, so radical in its provisions as to stun Washington, was supplemented by a statement signed by the presidents of the "Big Four," and containing these paragraphs:

"The railroad employees are in no mood to brook the return of the lines to their former control, since all the plans suggested for this settlement of the problem leave labor essentially where it has stood and where it is determined not to stand."

"Labor's railroad bill has the purpose of reducing the cost of living by operating the most important industry in the country for service rather than for profit."

The railroad employees at present number approximately 2,500,000. They control all the operating ends of the business from shop to train, and in the statement of the leaders is the underlying threat of a general strike unless the Sims Bill is passed. Such a threat was sufficient, in 1916, to pass the Adamson Law, which provided that railway employees receive ten hours' pay for eight hours' work. At that time the brotherhood presidents sat, watches in hand, outside the doors of Congress ready to call out their men unless the measure was passed before the hour of their ultimatum was reached, and it was passed.

Increases in wages for railway employees agreed to in 1917 added nearly $800,000,000 to the cost of operation, and another $70,000,000 was added the next year. In a communication to the Congress on August 1 President Wilson advised that the demands of the employees for still another $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 increase be agreed to and the Interstate Commerce Commission be instructed to increase rates to cover the new wage scale. The Brotherhoods are not satisfied with this plan, and will attempt to force through their own bill for participation in management and profits. Shop-workers were on strike on August 3, seriously complicating the situation and emphasizing its seriousness.

The full cabinet on August 6 took up a program for the reduction in the cost of living prepared by a committee representing the Treasury, the Federal Trade Board and the Railroad Administration. The main feature of the program is the use of $1,000,000,000 appropriated by Congress to maintain a guarantee of $2.26 a bushel for the 1919 wheat crop to cut the price of wheat. The resale price of wheat, under the guarantee, has been $2.40 a bushel and the administration believes that by forcing down the original price, perhaps one dollar a bushel on an estimated crop of 1,000,000,000 bushels, the resale price can be cut nearly in two. Opposition to this plan has been voiced by the farmer's representatives on the ground that it will discourage wheat-planting for the 1920 crop, The proposal is favored, however, on the theory that wheat is the basis of cost of most of the ordinary foodstuffs, and by bringing its price down other prices can be brought nearer level.

The Peace Treaty

THE Senate, during the week ending, August 2, made no appreciable advance in the disposition of the German peace treaty. There were, however, three outstanding developments.

First, Charles E. Hughes, last Republican candidate for the Presidency, prepared, at the request of Senators, four reservations which he insists should be attached to the League of Nations Covenant to "prevent sacrificing the essential interests of the United States." He would reserve the right of withdrawal from the League; would make certain American control over purely domestic questions; he would make very clear the article referring to the Monroe Doctrine; and he would eliminate the much-discussed Article X. Mr. Hughes's recommendations reached Senator Hale of Maine on July 28.

Second, President Wilson, the next day, transmitted to the Senate the text of the Franco-American treaty providing for American military assistance in the event of an unprovoked attack by Germany on France. Accompanying the treaty, the President sent a special request for its ratification, "along with the treaty with Germany."

Third, a group of Republican Senators placed in the hands of Senator Kellogg the task of drafting the text of four reservations to the League Covenant which they will support. The group is regarded as favoring "mild" reservations.

During the week the President continued his conferences with Senators both parties, outlining his views on th treaty, but there has been no visib sign of a change in line-up thus fa The presidential "swing around th circle" seems to have been indefinite postponed.

Russian Pendulum Swings Agai

ONCE again the pendulum swin in Russia. Forecasted for mor than a fortnight, the almost complet collapse of the Kolchak government a Omsk was disclosed in official despatch which have reached Paris. Accordin to these advices, the morale of th Kolchak army was becoming so ba following the recent Bolshevist vi tories, that there was little hope of i regaining its lost territory, and th government was preparing to move fro Omsk to Irkutsk, Siberia. Other messages reported a growing unrest i Siberia, to which the Czechoslovak were contributing. The Czech army large numbers of whom are bein repatriated through the United States are war-weary and are determined t get home at any cost and aid in th construction of their new state. In th meantime General Denikine, anti-Bolshevist leader in southwest Russia, ha been meeting with some success, capturing on July 31 the city of Poltava Coincident with the arrival of discouraging reports from Kolchak, Frank L Polk, head of the American peace delegation, told a group of French journalists that Kolchak will receive both mora and material aid from the United States.

The British government, following the withdrawal of American troops from the Archangel region, also has decided to get out of the country and General Sir Henry Rawlinson on July 31 was ordered to Archangel to direct the withdrawal. England has more than 10,000 men in the north. A squadron of warships will cover the evacuation.

Chicago's Race Riots

A NEGRO boy at one of the Chicago beaches was struck with a stone on Sunday, July 27. He fell from a raft and was drowned. That incident started a race riot that continued with growing intensity until the night of July 30, when more than 6,000 state troops with bayoneted rifles and full cartridge belts went on duty in the streets and gradually suppressed the disorder. For four days Chicago was in the hands of terrorists. Between thirty and thirty-five whites and negroes were killed, and the list of wounded exceeded 500. The police department was almost helpless in the face of the mobs, which were active not only in the city's big "black belt" but in several other districts. The rioters penetrated even into the business section, where porters and waiters were driven from their places of employment and stoned or beaten in the streets.

Government Ends Wire Control

AT MIDNIGHT of July 31 the Post Office Department returned to heir owners all the telephone and tele- raph systems, which had been under he control and operation of the Federal overnment for more than a year and half. In announcing the reversion to private control, Postmaster-General Burleson issued statement defend- ng federal opera- ion and citing briefly the benefits that had accrued to the properties and the employees.

Few internal war activities have aroused the criticism that followed the seizure of the wire communication lines and much of this criticism has been leveled at the head of Mr. Burleson. On August 1 several of the companies issued statements promising an immediate improvement in service and the Postal Telegraph Company announced a 20 per cent. reduction in rates. The cost to the government of the operation of the wires will not be known until November 1, when the Postmaster-General makes his annual reports to Congress.

Cruelty in American Prison Camp

STORIES of almost unbelievable cruelties in American army prison camps in France were told on July 29 to a Congressional sub-committee headed by Representative Royal Johnson at a hearing held in New York. The members listened for four hours to evidence by men who are serving terms imposed by courts martial for their treatment of prisoners under their control, to prisoners, and to Lieutenant-Colonel T. Q. Donaldson of the Inspector General's Department. The principal witnesses were Lieutenant Frank H. (Hardboiled) Smith, formerly in charge of Prison Camp No. 2 near Paris, and Sergeant Clarence C. Ball, one of Smith's non-commissioned officers. Both are serving terms of imprisonment at Fort Jay, New York, having been returned from abroad after conviction in connection with their conduct of the camp.

Among the charges admitted by Smith and Ball or sworn to by other witnesses were these the use of "black jacks" on prisoners, beating with fists, starvation, absence of blankets and cots, and theft of money and valuables taken from the prisoners on their arrival at camp. Smith said his orders to use harsh measures came from his superior officers. While much of the testimony related to conditions in Camp No. 2, witnesses insisted other camps would show an even more terrible record. Colonel Donaldson told the committee: "I never imagined such conditions could exist in any community of Americans."

Budget System a Step Nearer

THE growing demand in the country for a budget system in the Federal Government is having its effect in Congress, where on July 29 the House Rules Committee approved a resolution for the appointment of a special committee to study the question and devise a system applicable to our form of government. Such a committee has already been named in the Senate. The system of settling on the needs of the departments and agreeing on appropriations has been recognized for many years as not only crude and antiquated, but uneconomical and demoralizing to the spirit of cooperation. As Representative Good, chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, pointed out, however, nine different committees now have powers of appropriation and none of them have been willing to forego any of their functions.

It is the present intention of the special committees to study particularly the English budget system, which is regarded as the most perfect in use. In practical operation requests for appropriations from every government department would go to the treasury department (as in England), or a single house committee, where it would be considered in relation to the demands of every other government activity and to the year's revenues, and the distribution of the Federal funds would be made on a strict basis of need or merit. The people of the country, too, would know to the penny at the beginning of a fiscal year how much government would cost them. The practice of voting appropria-

THE spirit that keeps Heinz kitchens so spotless is the spirit of cleanliness. This spirit animates every employee. It penetrates every nook and corner, like the sunshine and the fresh air which come in so freely through the big windows. It radiates from immaculate floors and walls, is reflected from spotless utensils and is personified by the workers themselves in their freshly laundered uniforms. No careful housewife is more anxious about the appearance of her kitchen than these workers are about the appearance of theirs.

Amid such surroundings are made the Heinz 57 Varieties, whose appetizing qualities are enhanced by the certain knowledge that they are also pure and wholesome.

Japan May Lose Sunday School Meeting

PROTESTS are being made against holding the World's Sunday School Convention in Tokyo in October, 1920, because Tokyo is the capital of a nation "the hands of whose servants are red with the blood of Christian martyrs." The protests are being considered by the executive office of the World's Sunday School Association, but there is a feeling that a change would be detrimental to mission work in Japan.

Armenians in Grave Danger

ADVICES have reached Herbert C. Hoover, Director General of Relief, that the remnants of the Armenian nation are in grave danger of extinction by columns of Turks and Tartars which are hemming them in on three sides.

The message reached Paris from Major Joseph C. Green, of Cincinnati, who is directing the American Relief Administration's work from Tiflis. Major Green sent an urgent appeal for immediate aid by the Allies and declared: "If military protection is not afforded to Armenia immediately, the disaster will be more terrible than the massacres in 1915, and the Armenian nation will be crushed, to the everlasting shame of the Allies." He says the British forces now in occupation of the regions involved have strict instructions to take no hand in the work of restoring order, and asks of Mr. Hoover: "Cannot something be done to have the British forces in the Caucasus intervene to save Armenia?"

Congressman Royal C. Johnson of South Dakota, one of the investigators of the charges of cruelty and robbery in the American Army prison camps in France

The district involved is a large one, extending nearly from Lake Urmiah to the Black Sea and from Mosul to Tiflis. Something more than 1,000,000 destitute Armenians are in danger.

Church of England Changes

AN ENABLING bill is pending before the British Parliament which proposes to create a legislative body of three houses—bishops, clergy and laity—the last elected by the dioceses, to assume the control over the Church of England which is now exercised by Parliament. The new church assembly will have authority over creeds, services, ritual and finance, but will have no power to modify the theology of the church. The plan does not contemplate any loss of privilege or endowments by the church. The Free Churches of England are demanding that the measure go further and give Englishmen full religious self-determination by disestablishing and disendowing the established church.

Reopening Trade With Germaay

FIVE American commercial travelers on July 27 passed through the Coblenz bridgehead into Germany, and thus was opened, for the first time since the early winter of 1917, trade relations with that country. The United States now actively enters into competition with European houses for the business Germany will place in the world. The markets there are in a very much depleted condition, production has not been fully resumed, and American business men see a great field for the development of continental trade. Negotiations are under way between two of the most important German banks and an important American banking group for a loan of approximately $100,000,000 which will take the form of credit for goods purchased here.

Mr. Thomas H. MacDonald, the new director of the office of Public Roads and Rural Engineering, will supervise the expenditure of $175,000,000 in Federal funds and a like amount by the several States for building roads in the reconstruction period all over the United States. Mr. MacDonald comes to Washington from Iowa State College, and has had many years experience in road-building as head of the Iowa Highway Commission

Destroying American Airplanes

A CONGRESSIONAL sub-committee investigating army expenditures and sitting for a few days in New York heard witnesses on July 30 tell of a "million dollar fire" of airplanes at Colombey les Belles, in France, during the spring. Some 100 machines, valued at $11,000 each, were burned in one huge bonfire. Much other evidence of the disposal of army property to avoid returning it to this country was adduced by the committee. This included the disposition of 350,000 pairs of shoes to Belgium at a few dollars a pair, which shoe journals in the United States estimate will be worth $15 to $20 a pair here in the course of a year.

Universal Military Training

A VERY comprehensive and carefully defined scheme of universal military training is before Congress in the form of identical bills introduced simultaneously on July 31 by Senator George A. Chamberlain, Democrat, of the Senate Committee on Military affairs, and Representative Julius Kahn, Republican, chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee. The measures provide for six months' training by boys who reach the age of eighteen years, who may select either the navy or the army for their field. Following the training period, the boys will enter the army reserve for ten years. Annual registration of all males up to forty-five years may be required by the President, in line with the procedure of the last draft registration. This body of the citizenry is subject to immediate call into the military or naval service under regulations as they may be provided. A very thorough organization of the country into four military areas, each having a complete reserve army, is included in the bills which will be considered as a part of the Army Reorganization Bill now in process of drafting in the War Department.

New Era Conference

DELEGATES from every presbytery in the United States met at Stony Brook, Long Island, on July 28 for a conference to plan the aggressive work of the Presbyterian Church under the New Era Movement during the coming five years. The New Era Movement aims to win the world for Christ by applying the principles of brotherhood and Christianity to every phase of personal, social and community life. The conference gave much time to the subject of social betterment and community service. The goal of 250,000 family altars, 4,000 young men for the ministry and 3,500 laymen and women for active Christian work was laid before the conference. The slogan for the five years campaign is "The whole church marshalled behind its whole task, and a task for you." Five million dollars a year is to be raised for the benefit of aged and disabled Presbyterian clergymen. The conference was urged to do something definite and effective to reach the 1,000,000 to 1,750,000 persons who are each year committed to prisons, jails and workhouses in America, and whom the I. W. W. welcomes with open arms. Additional gifts of $9,000,000 were asked for a new equipment for existing missions and $6,000,000 for additional colleges in mission centers.

The Centenary Results

THE results of the financial canvass, which was essential to the spiritual purposes of the Methodist Centenary program, indicate that the goals have been well exceeded. The M. E. Church South has raised $54,000,000 and the Church North $113,740,000, with $12,000,000 more in sight from the Fall conferences. In the campaign thus far 451,000 persons have been pledged to pray for the success of Christ's cause throughout the world, and 193,210 have pledged to Church and charity a tenth of their income, while 25,000 persons have volunteered their lives for Christian service. The next Centenary drive will be a campaign for 1,000,000 members.

The Champion Among Fabric Tires

Miller Fabric Tires Set New Uniform Long-Distance Mileage Records

THE Miller Black Tread Fabric Tire competing against make after make of tires has proved itself the champion among Fabric Tires. Not in a few cases, but without exception, wherever Fabric Tires are used, these tires prove themselves uniform long-distance runners and lowest in cost per mile.

Extra-Size and More Buoyant

The Miller Black Tread Fabric Tire size for size, although rated the same as other makes, is extra-size. It is also more buoyant and has a greater air capacity.

The heavy fabric, tough black tread and the perfect balance of tread and fabric give these tires unequalled road-wear resistance. Tire after tire, the Miller Black Tread Fabric outruns standard guarantees. Yet these tires cost no more than other makes.

The big black, Geared-to-the-Road tread grips the ground giving perfect traction and safety over wet roads and slippery pavements.

The Test That Convinces

Only by Miller uniform workmanship has Miller uniform long-distance mileage been made possible. We have eliminated variables in workmanship. And thus have we ended variable in mileage.

Put Miller Tires—CORD or FABRIC to the test. Place them opposite your favorite tire. Then you will be convinced.

Dungeoned Hearts

SUNDAY. Lam. 1:12. "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?" Great things were happening, but these folks seemed to know nothing about it. God was on the field in mighty movement, but these folks were indifferent. They seemed to be living in another world, and the other world was a self-created prison. There are dungeoned hearts. The dungeon is not built in a day, but every day we may add to the thickness of its walls and strengthen its power of imprisonment. The walls are built from the secretions of selfishness. A selfish soul creates its own bondage. I would say that it exudes a deposit which seals up its own sympathies and discernments. Its relationships are checked and contracted more and more, and its fine communions are destroyed. At last all the active sensitive powers of the life are shut up in a heart of stone; they have become petrified; they are numb. They have no more feeling than statues, and like statues they do not hear the clamant and pitiful cries of the streets.

We can dungeon our hearts until the great cries of the world cannot reach us. Men can be "made to stumble" and we burn not. Indeed, we do not hear the wails of men. Many a cry may come from many a Macedonia, but they beat against a stony heart when they ought to be received on sensitive heartstrings which thrill with eager and sympathetic response.

In all such experiences the soul is suffering a deadly contraction. In dungeon lives the soul is like a shriveling kernel, becoming smaller and smaller in its hard encasement. And yet the supreme purpose of life is to grow a great soul, and to help other souls to grow theirs—souls with large communings, like spacious harbors, offering hospitable commerce to the laden liners which come from the near and distant parts of mankind. Our souls are purposed to have big relationships with God and man. Aye, with God! But the dungeoned heart ceases to have communion with God. It does not heed. It does not hear. "I stretched out my hands to you all the day long and ye would not hear." We cannot selfishly build a wall of stone between us and our fellows and maintain a living communion with our God. Dying sympathies and vital devotions cannot dwell together in one heart. If our interest in humanity is shrinking we cannot have a large and growing intimacy with God. The dungeoned heart shuts out both God and man. "If a man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?"

A Turning-Point in History

MONDAY. Gen. 12:1. "Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country to a land that I will show thee." History is a fascinating study, but confusing until we fix in our minds a few landmarks by which to measure human progress.

Abraham is one of the first of these landmarks. His migration is an event which marks a turning-point in history. We know nothing of the manner of his conversion from idolatry to monotheism, nor of the method of the divine call. We know only the fact that God called him and he obeyed. If he had not obeyed, the Old Testament had not been written. In a very real sense Abraham made history. How? By listening to the voice of God and heeding it. Was that an easy thing to do? Would it l easy for some young man of our da just married to pack his househo goods and start to Tasmania? He do not know just where Tasmania is, n how to get there. He knows more abo it than Abraham knew about the la toward which he started.

Five hundred years later there w another man who heard the voice of t Eternal. He was bidden to get out Egypt, and to take out of the land bondage all Israel. It might be easy f the young man just referred to to tak his journey to Tasmania, but suppose h were bidden to take with him the enti population of his country or his stat But Moses, like Abraham, went ou obedient to the summons of his Go If he had not gone, how different woul have been the history of a thousand year

A thousand years later there wa another, Saul of Tarsus. Was it eas for him to reverse the whole process o thought—to reverse himself? It is no easy for a modern Jew to accept Christianity. There is a young Christia Hebrew who was not only disinherite by his parents for his change of faith but whose name was published by them in the list of those who had died! Ha it ever occurred to us what Paul's relatives, who were not convinced of th Messiahship of Jesus, must have though of him and said of him when he turne Christian? May it not be possible tha the real reason Paul never married wa that he had a Hebrew sweetheart wh said to him, "You must give up Chri or give up me?" What if Paul had no obeyed the Voice! How poor would b the world without his life and letters!

Here are three great turning-point in history. Abraham, Moses, Paul. God spoke to them, they listened, mad sure of the meaning of the message obeyed, and all history breaks away t a new goal.

Religion is human reaction to th messages of the Infinite. The turning points of life are when we are in suc accord with God that we catch his voic through the voices of time. The grea moments of our lives are when w listen to God.

The Work of the Preacher

TUESDAY. II Tim. 4:2. "Preach the Word." Paul heralded Christ crucified, raised from the dead, ascended into heaven. Christ to him was the Word, the Way, the Truth, the Life and the Power. He did not deal in brilliant rhetoric, eloquent quotations from the poets, and learned disquisitions from science and philosophy. He preached what to the Greeks seemed foolishness and to the Jews fables, but to the penitent believer it was the power of God unto salvation. It was not given as the wisdom of men, but as the living Word and wisdom of God. The message is the greatest thing the minister has to present. It is not a question of voice, style, manner or oratory, but it is the burning truth from the Creator and the Judge of men.

When one gazes with rapture upon a great work of art, it is not the brilliant coloring or the genius of the artist that attracts you, but the majestic reproduction of the wonderful scene in nature. You exclaim, "How true to nature!" So when the minister portrays his Master, it is not the word painting, the beautiful coloring or the wonderful power of the speaker that thrills you, but the perfect image of the Lord Jesus Christ that will ever remain engraved on the memory, imprinted on the heart.

MEDITATION

W. Caswell, P. W. Wilson, D. J. Burrell, D.D.

Doing One Thing

WEDNESDAY. Phil. 3:13. "This one thing." The vocabulary of e early Church was curiously simple. ey talked in monosyllables, like love, , peace, and were little worried by hnical terms which encumber our eology. The creeds were still unitten, save in the heart. There was yet no catechism. The only suggesn of a liturgy that I can discover, and is scarcely a suggestion, is the thanksving at Jerusalem when persecution s threatened. Hymns and spiritual ngs were sung, but the melody had to first in the heart; there were no inted words and music. Nor were ere prayer books, only prayer; and no ticles of religion had then been drafted, less we regard as such the circular letr which dealt with various Jewish dinances. A bishop was not a peer the realm, but an overseer or shepard, who, as every man ought, looked ter the interests of others rather than s own. When Paul went about conming the churches, he strengthened em, as we all may do, with helpful ords. It was service rather than cereony.

And finally, we must get out of our inds the idea that a church in those ys consisted of bricks and mortar. hat the apostles meant by a church as not an edifice, with a pulpit and ancel, but a congregation or society of en and women, built together like ving stones; and they were quite conent to meet together in some upper oom, or "a place," or a private dwelling ke that of Mary the mother of John ark, where a housemaid called Rhoda cted as doorkeeper.

The disciples knew what the "one ing" was and they did it; and thereore they turned the world upside down.

P. W. W.

The Voices

THURSDAY. Job 38:1, 3. "Then the Lord answered Job out of the hirlwind and said . . . I will demand hee, and answer thou me." So does od confound our boastful littleness. he bravado that spoke of "arguments" nd "presenting a cause before him" as vanished into thin air. Nothing is ft but this: "Be still, and know that I m God."

And what is the purpose of it? To ring us to a realizing sense of our proper ttitude before God. We have much to ay about the dignity of man, and with oud swelling words we take great iberties with God. Our pride must ave a fall; otherwise we shall never get ur bearings.

But the voice out of the whirlwind is ot the only voice that speaks from eaven. Christ is heard at Calvary aying, "Come now, let us reason together; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." Here is a call to draw nigh in holy boldness and present our strong arguments at the throne of heavenly grace. We have thus an Advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous, in whose name we approach by a new and living way.

And still another voice—the voice that Elijah heard on Carmel. The forests were aflame; but God was not in the fire. The winds swept over the mountains; but God was not in the wind. The earth shook and trembled; but God was not in the earthquake. And after that, as the prophet knelt with his face between his knees, a still, small Voice, calling him to gird up his loins and address himself to the work before him. It is the voice of the Spirit, the voice that strives with all. But only they can hear it who bow low.

All depends on our attitude toward God. The Pharisee gets nothing; the publican goes back to his house justified.

D. J. B.

The Divine Lodestar

FRIDAY. John 12:32. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." Our Lord came unto his own and they received him not; but certain Greeks said, "Sir, we would see Jesus." Jesus said, "He that seeth me seeth Him that sent me"; also, "He that loveth his life shall lose it. If any man serve me, let him follow me." The words "I will draw all men unto me" would have been a wonderful saying if Christ had only meant those of his own people; but how grand and Godlike when he includes all races and all generations of mankind! Jesus did not mean that all men would become his followers; the magnet of the Cross draws toward him, but all do not believe in him, even when they know he is the divine Saviour. Some of Christ's noblest expressions were to those outside the Jewish people, such as the woman of Samaria, the Syro-Phœnician woman, and many others.

The prophets saw in the coming Saviour this drawing power when they wrote, "Unto Him shall the gathering of the people be"; "Unto thee shall all flesh come"; "And kings shall come to thy light and nations to the brightness of thy rising."

His power to hold you and protect you, to bless and to save, is equal to his power to draw you. "He will hold me fast" in the embrace of his everlasting arms. Do not resist him; yield to be drawn to his bosom by the magnet of love divine.

The First Churches

SATURDAY. Acts 17:24. "God . . . dwelleth not in temples made with hands." It was not until all the early Christians and their children had long been dead that money began to be spent on architecture. The world-wide mission was inaugurated with an open-air-meeting at some street-corner in Jerusalem. Paul preached whenever he could get a hearing—in synagogues, by the riverside at Philippi, on the hill of the pagan God Mars at Athens, on the steps of the citadel at Jerusalem, in Herod's palace, and in a hired house under the shadow of Caesar's throne, where he was, as he puts it, an ambassador in bonds. The energy we devote to mortgages, debts and bazaars was concentrated by these pioneers on the supreme task of winning men. Why should they waste their forces on material shrines? Anywhere and everywhere they expected to meet God. The first vision came to Stephen when he was in the prisoner's dock. The second came to Paul on a turnpike road. The third came to Peter—in a tannery, of all places!—and the last came to John in a salt mine.

Nor did they waste time or temper in wrangling over ordinances. They broke their bread simply, going from house to house. There were no baptisteries; and Philip, when approached by the Ethiopian eunuch, used a well in the desert of Gaza, now familiar to the armed forces of the Allies. At Philippi Paul and Silas administered the rite in a jailer's lodge. The thing to be done was not to elaborate systems, but to save souls.

Bubble Grains
Make Other Foods Delightful

Like Puffed Nut-Meats

Puffed Grains are breakfast dainties, but that's not all. Two are whole grains which supply whole-grain nutrition All are food confections, fairy-like in texture, nut-like in their taste.

Puffed Wheat makes bowls of milk vastly more inviting. And milk with whole wheat, steam exploded, is the pinnacle in food.

Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs add to fruit a fascinating blend. The grains are fragile, flaky, flavory. They add to fruit what crust adds to a shortcake or to pie.

Crisp and butter them and these airy grains become nut-like confections. There is no between-meal dainty which compares with these.

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice Corn Puffs

Food Cells Exploded

Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs taste like puffed nut-meats on ice cream. And home-made candies are made light and nutty by them. Puffed Wheat or Corn Puffs make flimsy toasted wafers for your soups.

In Puffed Grains we blast every food cell. Over 100 million steam explosions are caused in every kernel. Thus every granule is fitted to digest, and every atom feeds. These are the best-cooked grain foods in existence, and the most bewitching. If you believe in whole grains made wholly digestible, use them wherever you can.

Serve one of them in some way every day.

Porto Rico's Union Church

PORTO RICO has a live, progressive, and steadily growing Union Church, with a pastor who seems to have been made to order to fill its pulpit. It was organized a little over a year ago, soon after one of seven regional conferences was held in San Juan, this conference taking place in March of 1916.

One of the findings of this very interesting and instructive assembly was on the subject of work among the English-speaking people in Porto Rico, and was as follows: "Recognizing the importance of providing for the spiritual life and fellowship of the English-speaking people residing in Porto Rico, and conserving their influence in religious work, we recommend that in all communities where there are enough Americans to warrant it the denomination in charge of that section be urged to provide English services; and that in common territory there be but one non-liturgical church, and the details of this plan be left to the Central Conference Committee." After several committee meetings were held in San Juan, and the members of the Central Conference Committee representing the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Hugh O'Neill Memorial Presbyterian Church came to a satisfactory understanding, framing at the same time a proposed constitution for the Union Church, a congregational meeting was held at which the constitution was adopted, and a few weeks later, after the morning service on Sunday, November 11, 1917, another congregational meeting was held, and a call was extended to Rev. F. E. Maguire of Denver, Colorado, to become the first pastor of San Juan's Union Church.

Rev. F. E. Maguire

This was perhaps one of the best moves made by the English-speaking church people of San Juan. For years the two churches had struggled with fluctuating congregations and more fluctuating offerings, ever confronting the problem of an indifferent population of Americans who neither helped support the church nor attended church regularly. By the organization of a Union Church the two struggling congregations became one prosperous body and things began to happen. Mr. Maguire and his wife were all that could be expected of them, and an enthusiasm and interest such as had never been known to exist among the English-speaking people of San Juan was apparent more and more. In fact, this has been a record church year amo the English-speaking people of San Ju People who showed practically interest in the church now atte regularly and send their children Sunday school.

Just how far-reaching the work this church may be in connection w the moral progress of our beautiful isl we cannot tell, yet who knows that success of th church in the ca ital city shall r bring about the co solidation of all t Protestant missi work in the isla and thus facilit the work of eva gelization? As it now there are ma denominations a inadequate app priations to me the needs of ea mission field. Ea denomination has certain portion the island to and a wonderf work is being do The natives respo with eagerness the simple Gosp story, but there every reason to b lieve that if t work of all the denominations w consolidated in one union or int denominational m sion, a still mo forceful work cou be done. Here lies the power the Roman Churc and herein it proving its pow in Porto Ri today.

After the Ame cans took possessi of the island so twenty years ago and Protestant m sions were started, the Romani seemed to be going to the wall, and t Protestant work advanced rapidly; b after twenty years we find that t Romanists were quietly and united preparing to do something large, a they succeeded. Within a few mont time large churches and schools ha been erected in different parts of t island, and union has made the powerful again. This, however, shou not indicate that Protestantism h lost ground, but it should make us co sider whether or no we shall go pulling in separate bodies, or wheth in one strong Union body we shall n pull together and thus benefit mo the individual native church memb uplift in a more effectual way the ent moral caliber of the island, and prom in a larger and broader sense t Kingdom of God and his righteousne

At all events Union Church has ju closed a record year. It is one of fo union churches, of which there a thirteen in all, that has been able report entire self-support, and it aims accomplish this and much more in th year of double ciphers which may interpreted to mean double opportu ties.

A Unique Mission

IN THE village of Downer's Grove, Ill., Victoria Wellman, a devoted Christian worker, has established a unique mission, which does a large part of its mission work by mail. It is called the Heartsease Mission, and its mail department, if we may use the expression, is called the "Heartsease Prayer Circle." The aim of the Heartsease Mission is to be a helper and friend, and a blessing to all hearts that are sad. It appeals to shut-ins, those who long to serve but see no opportunity, those whose crosses seem too heavy to bear, those who are misunderstood and in need of sympathy, and the bereaved.

The Heartsease Mission was begun an offering "in memoriam" to honor a l devoted to Christian service, and the c voted Christian worker who conducts t mission seeks to discover as helpers tho who, full of love to Godand man, wish devote their lives to Christian servi Charity and sympathy must be the m tives, so she desires the help of such have never had any chance, who ha been shut in by sickness, who are cri pled, or who are suffering from other m fortunes, as these only can understa the discourged, the afflicted, and t handicapped. It is meant to be a clea ing-house for good works.

Inspirational Northfield

By MARY E. HALSTED

HERE is so much in daily city life to drag down one's ideals—so much to hinder spiritual growth—it is good to live awhile in an at- phere like East Northfield, where beauty and peace of surroundings and open the soul to spiritual things. ere the friendly hills lift their round ls in quiet strength that shames ything small or sordid, and the ht line of river lects them inst smiling s and glorious ets, and hurries to tell mighty an about them. he little New land village has air of detach- t well suited to unique work. ugh seemingly secluded, it is ing with life, its schools on er side of the river are filled with ng people all winter, and through summer months thousands gather he great campus for the conferences. here is so much room, and the visi- are so different from those that fashionable resorts, that the place s its look of peace in spite of all activity. One wonders where the t crowd gathered in the Auditorium them- es be- een tings; t you them games Marck- ard unds, with em to ount rmon, ee them walking hrough beauti- woods Garnet like one great family, and hear singing up there at sunset.

The Auditorium

The friendly hills lift their round heads in quiet strength

nd those meetings! Platform, choir audiences are as different from the inary sanctuary as sunshine from dow. The big Auditorium is so , airy and light that one does not shut in—one feels no restriction of . The platform allows no denominational lines; the message is broad. No sensational methods are used; everything is wholesome, genuine and sane. The speakers are chosen from the world's best. Through these conferences one has the privilege of looking into the face and hearing the message of some of the most advanced, the most spiritual men of the times—leaders in all the varied branches of Christian work.

The great choir under Charles Alexander is an inspiration in itself and one sings with it in the song services right from the heart. An extra choir of children's voices calls one, like "angels of Jesus," to better things.

The Northfield season is now in full swing. Four conferences have already been held: Young Women's, Student Y. M. C. A., Home and Foreign Missions, marked by large attendance and enthusiastic programs. The last of these closed a successful session of eight days with a total registration of about 1,100.

The height of interest and power of influence is usually reached in the August conference, when workers in all branches of Christian activity gather for seventeen days of conference and fellowship. The coming of peace has made possible the return of the well-known English preachers, Dr. G. Campbell Morgan and Dr. J. D. Tiplady, author of "The Cross at the Front." The American pulpit will be represented by Dr. Harris E. Kirk of Baltimore, Dr. A. T. Robertson of Louisville, Dr. Len G. Broughton of Nashville, and others.

There is a full schedule of Bible classes and conference groups in addition to the platform meetings and the services on Round Top.

An Experiment in Church Unity

URING the week of April 13 to 18 the Bridgeport Christian Union, ., the City Mission, at Bridgeport, nn., celebrated its ninth anniversary. is interdenominational organization the churches, of which Rev. Charles Simpson is superintendent, was rted by the Bridgeport Pastors' As- iation for rescue and relief work in slums. About six years ago a branch the work, known as the Bridgeport tective Association, was organized work among women.

ast winter the Association voted to ke a thorough and systematic study the social and religious conditions of idgeport. This survey, carried out Dr. John R. Brown, pastor of the st Baptist Church, now a professor the Rochester Seminary, showed that this city of 180,000 people there were hty-six churches and synagogues, and ht unoccupied fields. At a meeting representatives of the churches, a urch federation of Bridgeport and inity was formed, and later $13,000 s raised to cover a budget of two ars' expenses. The design is to re- trict Bridgeport in a very thorough y, encourage moving some churches, ild new ones in unoccupied districts, d giving help financially where neces- y, denominational lines being largely sight of. The question as to which denomination will build the new church will be carefully considered, and then the denomination will have the field to itself.

A new home of the Christian Union is about to be started, and it is to be hoped that the next anniversary services will be held in the chapel of the new building. Two of the converts of the Union are assistant superintendents. The recent gift of a church building in the south end of the city, known as the Immanuel Branch, permits an extension of the work in the form of Sunday school and social settlement work.

The purpose of the conference is to gather together representatives from various nations to compare views as to the moral interests of mankind, and to aid in conserving the moral gains and repairing the moral damage of the war.

Hens Lay While Moulting

E. J. Reefer, the poultry expert, has discovered a scientific product that hastens the moult and revitalizes the organs of the hen and puts her in fine laying condition. The tonic is called "More Eggs," and a package of it is enough to carry the ordinary chicken raiser over the entire moulting season. First to lay is first to pay. "Since using 'More Eggs' I get forty to fifty eggs a day instead of eight or nine," writes A. P. Woodard of St. Cloud, Florida. A million dollar bank guarantees that you can have your money back if you want it. So, you don't take any risk. Send $1.00 for a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic. If you want to hurry the moult and get more eggs, act at once. It means more profit for you. Don't wait, but order today. Send $1 today to E. J. Reefer, C849 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Missouri. Or ask Mr. Reefer for his valuable poultry book, free, that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.

A Remarkable Investment

By L. D. FERNALD, Business Manager of the Christian Herald

PROBABLY every reader of Christian Herald owns one or more United States Government War Bonds—the Liberty Loans and the Victory Loan.

Many of you bought at the time they were offered, mainly if not solely from patriotic motives; but have never thought of buying more now, from a mainly profitable, but incidentally patriotic, motive.

The patriotic motive still exists; for every Liberty Bond purchased helps just that much to keep up or improve the price of the bonds, and therefore the credit of the United States Government. It helps also to better the whole business situation, because as long as United States Government Bonds—the absolute maximum in safety of investment—pay the present high yields, all other interest rates must be proportionately high. States, municipalities, corporations, railroads, farmers—even the Government itself in its short-term borrowing—would pay less for the use of money if the yield from Liberty Bonds were lower.

This situation is the investor's opportunity. There is not an iota of question about the safety of the principal invested in Liberty Bonds. Yet—to those who buy them at present low prices—they offer unusual returns on the money invested.

Interest yields of between 4½% and 5%—absolutely exempt from all taxation (federal, state and local)—can be had on Liberty Bonds purchased at the prices ruling at the time this is written, if bonds are held to maturity.

For example, suppose you purchase a $1,000 Third Liberty 4¼% bond at 95. The cost is $950. You receive $42.50 interest each year. $42.50 per year on $950 is 4.48%. But if you hold them until they mature—September 1928—the Government will pay you $1,000 for the bond for which you paid in 1919 only $950. This profit of $50, divided into nine annual parts, amounts to 0.55%. Adding this to your 4.48% gives an average annual yield for nine years of slightly over 5%—on a United States Government bond, exempt from all taxation!

By a similar process, you will find the yield, present prices, on other 4¼% issues, if held to maturity:

nearly 4⅝% on 1st 4¼'s
nearly 4¾% on 2nd 4¼'s
4¾% on 4th 4¼'s

Each of these three issues may, however, be called at the Government's option from five to fifteen years before date of final maturity. If the Government should exercise this option, the investor's annual yield would be still larger.

Many investors are—quite reasonably—expecting a very remarkable yield on their Liberty bonds purchased in 1919. They claim that there is every likelihood of their appreciating in value to par or better within the next two years. If this occurs, then they not only enjoy tax exemption for two years, when all taxes are highest, but they can then sell their bonds at a profit of from five to six points—or $50 to $60 on each thousand dollar bond bought now and later sold at par.

In the case of the Third 4¼'s mentioned above, this profit of $50 in two years amounts to 2½% per year in addition to the 4½% interest yield—or the actual equivalent of a 7% yield for two years.

The reasonableness of this possibility will be readily admitted by anyone who has studied the increases in price of all United States, British, French, etc., government war bonds in the years of peace immediately after every war.

Of course, in doing so the advantage of long-term investment is completely lost; it becomes then only a two-year investment and the principal must be reinvested then, on terms considerabl less favorable for long term investme than exist today.

The value of tax exemption varies, course, with each investor. State a local taxation is higher than ever fore, and is bound to be high for so years to come. But no one can tax t income from Liberty bonds—nor the principal be taxed, directly or directly. Each investor can figure this vantage for himself in dollars and cents

Then there is the Federal income t which ranges from 4% upward this y on net incomes above $1,000 for an married person, or $2,000 (plus $200 each child) for a married man.

Each investor can thus figure the vantage to himself, according to his o income, of the total exemption fr federal, state and local taxes. amounts to virtually increasing 4½% to 5% yield by just the amount taxation saved.

Yet this is not "tax dodging," cause the government welcomes havi you put your money into its own se rities, and gives you this tax-exempti privilege as part of your reward for doing.

To the average investor this exemption is complete, though larger amounts of Liberty bonds the exemption is limited to a period of ye after the war. A total of $5,000 Liberty bonds is exempt from all ta tion for any length of time held; $30,0 more, exempt for five years after official termination of the war; a further amounts are exempt for shor periods.

Liberty bonds can be had in denom ations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000 and Each investor can purchase exactly amount he wants, by combining vari denominations, thus making every work. They can be purchased from a investment house or bank in the cou try. They can be sold as easily as th were bought, if it is necessary at a time to convert them into cash—thou the better thing to do is to take them your local banker and borrow 90% their market value at a reasonable r of interest; repaying the loan and g ting back your bonds at the first opp tunity.

To repeat—among the many markable opportunities available at t time, Liberty bonds deserve the spe consideration of every careful investo

In later issues of the Christian H ald other good forms of investment be presented, to help you to secure versification of investments, with safe and good interest yield.

To Minister to the Transients

THE Madison Avenue Baptist Church in New York City, whose pulpit has known many men of might, spiritual leaders in their own church and in the nation, has called Dr. George Caleb Moor of the Baptist Temple in Brooklyn. Dr. Moor has accepted the call and will take up his new duties on the first Sunday in September. Dr. Moor has led the activities of the Baptist Temple for over five years. Two years ago the church was gutted by fire and rebuilt, but its work went on. It has now a fine enthusiastic body of 2,300 members. In a neat little certificate of membership which is given to each new member Dr. Moor prints "A Word of Welcome," in which he says: "Church members are of two classes: workers and shirkers. I trust that as a pledged follower of Christ you will take your place among the workers." Then follow seven helpful rules for Christian living. It would appear that few of the 2,300 members can be shirkers, for under Dr. Moor's ministry the Temple has become a center of evangelical power, its auditorium seating 2,000 is crowded twice on Sunday, and each evening from 400 to 500 remain for an after-meeting in which souls are saved. It is seldom that a week passes without a conversion and there is no let-up in the summer. The vibrant life of the church expresses itself in clubs for boys and girls, in Junior and Senior Young People's Societies, in a wide program of varied social service; but the power behind it all is the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the crucified and risen Saviour of men.

Dr. George Caleb Moor

Dr. Moor plans to make Madison Avenue Church just such a center of evangelism as the Baptist Temple is today. He is certain that there is a tremendous opportunity to preach the simple Gospel. He says: "There never was a time in the history of New York when so many people were hungering for the Gospel of Christ in its creative and redemptive force."

Madison Avenue is an endowed church. It is free of debt and has the certain income of $300,000 as a basis for its work. Dr. Moor believes that this will be a help rather than a hindrance, for he says, "The rich people of Madison Square have their faces toward the future; they have a vision and believe in social service."

The church is located in a mixed residence and business district. All about it and above it rise great loft buildings. The residences which have not been given over to business are mostly boarding-houses, and there are a number of boarding-houses for young men and women not far away on the east side of Fourth Avenue. There are several large hotels near at hand, and the church could not be better situated for the Gospel ministry to this heart-hungry transient class. There is a dependable nucleus of loyal members, some of whom now live in distant sections of the city, and Dr. Moor takes up the work with a high purpose and with a courage based upon experience and inspired with the promises which never fail.

Soldiers and the Gospel

AFTER one year and six mont evangelistic work in forty camps desire to encourage all evangelical Chr tians in their work.

In the army as elsewhere, I am gl to testify that there is no subject so po ular as the Gospel of Jesus Christ, mattered not whether it was inject between reels, in band concerts, o the athletic field, the interest of the m was always beyond the faith and pl of the workers.

In the fourth campaign at Camp Cu ter, we met the same men upon their turn from France whom we had met the meetings of the first campaign year previous. Literally, hundreds tified in the open air before their c rades, by holding up with pride the T taments they had carried and used d ing the bloody struggle overseas.

The Religious Director has just se me his report, in which he says: "O thousand three hundred and twenty- men came forward in our open air mee ings, conducted from the truck, to g Testaments, either as renewals or r ceiving them the first time. Of th number, 326 signed the Pocket Test ment League, agreeing to carry God Word and read a chapter daily in life, because they had found it so prof able in army service."

What Is a Boy's Best Habit?

WHAT is a boy's best habit? Ask his mother and she will probably tell you that most of the he hasn't got one, but when stmas comes around best habits on him in bunches, like grapes on e. It's a long way from Christmas now, so when Gordon M. Reese led to try to find out what a boy's habit was he went to the boys selves.

r. Reese had been conducting an isive campaign among boys for the oit Brotherhood of St. Andrew, a ien's organization of the Episcopal ch. His work is finished now, but igh the Nation-Wide Campaign e Episcopal Church it will be possi- for the Brotherhood and for Mr. e to do similar work in other cities, the Nation-Wide Campaign is a paign to enlarge and continue all activities of the Church.

hen Mr. Reese asked his question sked it with no intention of Pharisa- He wanted to know each boy's habit and how it was formed. He ted to get down to a real under- ding of each boy. He gave them to think and asked them to write n their answers. A few days later ot the replies.

ith boyish frankness most of the wrote that they had no best ts. The question puzzled one chap and ent to his mother and asked her and answer read: "Helping my mother," he says. It was formed by her."

hile many of the boys owned up variety of best habits, nearly all them attributed the formation of these habits to the direct influence of their mothers. One boy said his best habit was "never being late or disappointing any one." Another replied that it was "trying to do the right thing." A third thought it was playing the piano, and he said his mother kept after him to learn that. A boy who had been hasty replied that his best habit was "Concentration, formed by necessity." Another put it more clearly when he said: "Thinking before I act; I came to grief several times by too hasty action." Many said their best habit was keeping clean, and one said it was "Not smoking or chewing."

Mr. Reese's campaign was to encourage and train the boys for Christian service. He knew the boy problem and he tackled it. He arranged dinners for fathers and sons and for mothers and sons. When the fathers were the guests the mothers served the meal, and when the mothers were the guests the fathers waited on table. He soon found that the boys had a genuine complaint; they were made to go to church, but their parents seldom came. It had occurred to few fathers and mothers that their sons didn't like having church for the family wished on them, and the result was that when the boys said these things at the dinners, fathers and mothers made a mental resolve to go to church more often, and kept it.

WHAT is a boy's best habit? The Christian Herald invites its boy and girl readers, of all ages, to send in their own answers to this vital question.

Social Responsibility

International Sunday School Lesson for August 24
Luke 10:25-37; Gal. 6:2, 9, 10; James 2:14-16

e Christian Ideal of Human Brotherhood

y Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

he actual details of the Samaritan's istry are in line with the highest ught of modern times concerning the tment of the unfortunate: personal rest, immediate relief, thorough care an intention to follow up the case ond mere temporary alleviation.

he frightful and manifold sufferings the Great War have their brighter interfoil in the marvelous extension the spirit of the Good Samaritan ich resulted. Little Armenian chil- n by the thousands have been gath- d up and "taken to the inn," the etcher-bearers have risked their lives battle-fields, carrying men not only their own beasts but upon their own ks, through frightful scenes. The d Cross with its myriad ministries ght just as well have been called the rld's Good Samaritan as the Greatest ther in the World.

When men speak pessimistically about results of Christianity in the ages, s not forget that all these things a direct outcome of the teachings Jesus. Social responsibility is a ristian heritage. When we consider problems of the poor, of the slums great cities, of good government, of better international order of things, are not leaving the things that per- in to Jesus. That same spirit of Jesus ch produced the hospital, the home fatherless children, the school for blind, has awakened today a world- de interest in the possibilities of a ague of Nations, with the substitu- of responsibility and brotherhood selfishness and force. Amid all the untless difficulties involved Christ es on to better things.

St. Paul is usually thought of as the ounder of theological theory, but eryone who reads his letters without econceived ideas knows how thorough- practical he was. One of his biggest contributions was in applying the altruism of the Sermon on the Mount to the conditions surrounding those to whom he wrote. Both in Romans and in Corinthians he is advocating the strong bearing the infirmities of the weak. He is dealing with one of the most difficult fields of altruism, where one foregoes one's own freedom of conduct in the light of the limitations of others.

That is an unusually suggestive paragraph on burden-bearing in Galatians 6. The injunction to Christians to bear one another's burdens, coupled with the maxim that every man shall bear his own burden, has puzzled many. Surely one of its meanings is this—that they who bear their own burdens in serene faith and patience are always and everywhere the most ready and helpful in assuming the burdens of others also. Paul also points out the danger of wearying in well-doing; he urges continuous readiness to serve all men, "especially them who are of the household of faith."

The burden of Christian responsibility has shifted in our day from charity to justice. We are unwilling to maintain nothing but ambulances to pick up the victims of greed and robbery, and rescue missions to reclaim the victims of drink and drugs. We are beginning to insist on fair play for the poorest and lowest laborers, and the suppression of the traffic in the things that corrupt and break down the manhood of our fellows.

The greatest present problem seems to be that of the readjustment of industry. The Christian Church feels a responsibility in the midst of the conflicting claims of employers and workers. She has formulated the "Social Creed of the Churches" with its modern applications of the Beatitudes to hours and conditions of labor and the division of its product between the capitalist, the toiler, the manager, and the general public. A Bible class is within its true field when it secures a copy of this Social Creed and endeavors to trace its remarkably Scriptural sources in Old Testament and New.

rising scorn and contempt. As he gathered the words that he was to be bound a captive, Will Pinckney rushed at him. As he struggled in his grasp Will whispered,

"Run, Silent Wolf, and I'll try to follow and help."

The Indian boy burst through the gaping crowd and fled away down the trail. He alone would go back and help his sorely beset father.

Scarcely had he gotten beyond the stump fields and into the forest when he caught the pound of a horse's hoofs behind. He slipped into a crevice in a great split rock and waited. From his perch he saw a post rider urging his horse to the uttermost speed down the woodland road and spur northward along the trail to the settlements.

Then came the pound of other hoofs. Will Pinckney flashed into view, taking the eastern fork toward Silent Wolf. The latter sprang down from his hiding-place with a glad cry. The horse reared wildly and was jerked to a snorting halt. He swung up behind and they were off at breakneck speed toward Great Rock. Will would help him even if the other palefaces were materiooty (cowards).

Will had a beautiful slender thunder-stick slung over his shoulders and a small one which he thrust into Silent Wolf's hands.

Away they dashed, down the slippery track among the great trees. The horse's hoofs thundered over the dry places and struck fire from among the stones. They came close to Great Rock. Leaving the sweated horse tied to some trees they crept eagerly forward.

Several thunder-sticks clattered in unison. A glancing bullet whined off to their left. They slipped up the back side of Great Rock. It was a gently sloping incline, ending abruptly in the sheer cliff which overhung the caves. From this crest they hoped to outshoot the enemy.

As they advanced up the slope they sighted a Mohawk peering over. Very quickly he crawled out on a gnarled tree that overhung the precipice. Some ten feet out he steadied himself and took careful aim at something below.

Silent Wolf started forward with a smothered cry on his lips. It was too far for bowshot and he knew not how to use the little thunder-stick which nestled in his left hand. At that moment Will fired, resting his stick in the crotch of a sapling.

The clang of the stick was followed by a queer grinding crash and a thunder that whirled through the woods. They rushed forward. The Mohawk had dropped his stick and started to scramble back. The tree shook violently as though smitten by a tempest. Then it and the Mohawk and even the very cliff edge disappeared in a vast crunching and smother of noise.

The frosts of the Winter before and the terrific rain of yesterday had loosened the rock. The cliff face had fallen.

From the new-made edge they saw the Mohawks running wildly. They heard their terrified cries of Manitou! Manitou! as they fled away through the woods.

A whir of beating wings and a familiar whistle, and Bog Trotter settled gently on Silent Wolf's quiver.

Some hours later the boys pulled Runs Foaming out from the shattered debris of the cave.

Several times Silent Wolf would given up the search, thinking it wa will of Manitou, the Great Spirit. Will Pinckney was stubborn, like Yan-oukies, and dug on, throwing great rocks easily, with a heavy which he used most skilfully.

That night with his father ridin the horse and the two boys stead from either side, a little proces wound slowly back to Eastcheste they neared the stockades Will forward and called loudly. As soo their story was told express riders rushed off east and west and southw to warn the outlying settlements Mohawks were lurking at hand.

Will became a great hero among other boys, and so did Silent Wolf and his father slept and rested in a near Will's home while Runs Foam gained back his strength.

Now, he said, since he had two g thunder-sticks he was determined t north and search for Red Bird. Si Wolf also had a stick dropped by fleeing Mohawks, as did Will. N more would he, Runs Foaming, dr the paleface's strong water. Ne more would he work as a slave in t stuffy kitchens. He would be a man and range the Mohawks' coun until his name became a terror to t villages.

All this gladdened Silent Wolf.

He and Will swore an oath of brot hood near the old sacred Indian st called Mishow, which lay in the up meadow. How in another day, ye later, this strange brotherhood saved Will, and how he in turn res Silent Wolf when he fell into the hawks' hands just two winters later not for this tale.

Bulgars Wait for Their Treaty. The Bulgarian peace delegation handed in its credentials at Paris on July 28. Germany is furnishing all her available delousing equipment and is facilitating the movement of medical stores.

Salvaging the German Fleet. One battleship, three light cruisers and fifteen destroyers, comprising a small part of the German fleet sunk by the German crews recently in the Scapa Flow, are being salvaged. The British Government on July 30 expressed its doubt as to whether the salvage operations could be greatly extended.

Canada Will Buy Wheat. The Canadian government announced on July 30 its intention to buy and market the Canadian wheat crop for 1919. The wheat will be sold at the "prevailing world prices," and any surplus will be divided among the original owners. Strict precautions are being taken against speculation and profiteering.

WENTY-SIX YEARS OF PRIORITY PRODUCED THE

APPERSON

"The Eight With Eighty Less Parts"

Since the World's Fair year of 1893 the Apperson Brothers have built automobiles. From the beginning they have persistently broken trail for the industry.

The Apperson Brothers have probably contributed as many original ideas to motor car manufacture as any two other builders in this country.

These pioneer motor car builders of Kokomo have been first in a score of notable achievements of design and construction—

Such as the first double opposed motor; the first car with float feed carburetor; the first car with electric ignition; the first chummy roadster, the first chummy plus tourster and the "eight with eighty less parts" motor. An Apperson won the first American speed contest; made the first 100-mile non-stop run and made the first overland tour.

Today when motor cars have become more of a commonplace the Appersons lift car making out of the rut of mediocrity. They take the burden and responsibility of the pioneer. They now custom-make motor cars.

Whether it be the new Apperson for 1920 or its dressier companion—the Anniversary Model—both driven by the "eight with eighty less parts" the craftsmanship of the Apperson Bros. has reached its zenith in these new models.

As builders of custom made cars these two master motor men today weave into their product knowledge gained through twenty-six years of experience. It was in 1893 that the Apperson Brothers, in co-operation with others, built with their own hands the first mechanically successful automobile.

So today in an Apperson it is possible for you to get:
A gliding acceleration in high of from 1 to 40 miles an hour in 20 seconds.

Braking action that curbs the speed from 40 miles an hour to a dead stop in 40 yards—4 seconds. A lineal descendant of the famous "Jack Rabbit" racers of the past. (The Apperson is the "Jack Rabbit" car.)

An 130-inch wheelbase car that turns in a 38¼-foot circle. A car manufactured throughout in two plants personally supervised by the two Apperson Brothers. Rugged Hoosier construction topped by a style dress from the World's metropolis.

Drive an Apperson first — then decide — Let your dealer show you what you get if you travel the Apperson Way.

THE whole week of August 31 to September 6, will be devoted to a drive for better pictures in thousands of the better theatres, big and small, all over America.

What a nation does with its spare time is a mighty good test of the heart of that nation.

And the verdict of America's whole heart and mind on Paramount-Artcraft leaves no shadow of doubt as to what sort of screen entertainment America prefers.

The week of August 31 inaugurates a season of new and surprising achievements in Paramount-Artcraft Pictures.

After seven years of gathering way, Famous Players-Lasky Corporation has mobilized all the great geniuses of production; dramatists, directors, artists, technicians; and is equipped with facilities of the utmost magnitude to capture from the realm of soaring imagination photoplays of Homeric power and occult charm.

As in the past the proof is written large in increased showings at more theatres, more frequent attendance by more people, and the making of that better theatre in every community the magnet that draws the people as surely as the moon draws the tides.

THE PROBLEM OF HIGH PRICES

e Main Elements of Disturbance That Threaten at Any Moment to Precipitate Critical Conditions

RESIDENT WILSON has given up everything else for consideration of the dangerous economic and industrial position in which the United States finds itself today.

e conferences with Republican Senators on the ue of Nations have been called off for the time , and the question of America's foreign policy orarily has gone by the board.

grave are the economic conditions, in the view of dministration, that they supersede in importance he moment even the League of Nations and the cation of the peace treaty, which until now has preeminent in the eyes of the President.

e President is said to recognize that the present tion is surcharged with the utmost danger. He is tful that a radical reduction in prices can be ted quickly by any measure economically sound. he other hand, he is being besieged on every hand orkers who want big increases in their wages to the high cost of living. They will not wait for s to come down. Their need is immediate, they rt, and if they do not get relief at once they will out and paralyze industry.

THER countries are passing through similar troubles—in most cases, worse. But it is being ressed upon the Administration that the situation need not develop far before it is as bad as it is in e of the countries of Europe. If hundreds of usands of railway employees walk out and are fol- ed by workers in other lines, the country will be atened by industrial chaos.

dozen committees of both houses have been busily work on the railroad and high cost of living prob- s, but none of them have made much effective gress. The Senate Committee on Agriculture ed to begin hearings on August 18 on the Kenyon Kendrick bills to regulate the meat-packing in- try. The Kenyon Bill is being pushed hard a measure of relief; currency deflation is being sidered and investigations are being ordered; but e of these activities is of wide enough scope to get the root of the evil.

ne suggestion was in regard to an embargo on the pment of foodstuffs to Europe, but it was admitted a total embargo would be disastrous to Europe d probably would not help this country a great deal. e best way out of the embargo situation, it is likely, uld be for the Administration to prohibit the expor- ion of those foodstuffs which are now selling here at highest prices and which are not absolutely neces- ry to the life of Europe.

T THE first sign of change in the legislative tone at Washington, prices of corn, pork and cotton gan to fall. The profiteers, noting an indication of shift in the propping-up policy which has prevailed r since the armistice, made haste for cover.

All that seems wanted to adjust prices to fit pockets restoration of competitive conditions in store and tory. The government destroyed competition at e outset of our entry into the war by furiously bid- g up the prices of commodities and labor. Since stilities ceased the endeavor has been to hold up, hen it should have been to let down. In seeking to void an inflation of currency we have had an inflation f values.

What is value? The economists define the value of y article as its exchange power in all other articles. But it is obviously misleading to test the value of one commodity, or of many commodities, in the terms of one particular commodity only. Yet that is what we do. We test the value of everything in currency.

The price of wheat, tested by the price of steel, is not high. Meat, measured by any other product of labor, is not soaring in price. All prices are soaring pretty much alike. They are approximately twice as high as they used to be for the simple reason that the measuring-stick, money, has shrunk about one-half.

MEASURED by its power to buy, the British pound sterling, the French franc, the Italian lira are each worth less than half what they were worth five years ago, and the American dollar only a little more than half what it was.

Of course, when paper dollars are so plentiful that the buying power of one of them is only half what it was in 1914, the selling price of all commodities doubles. Naturally there is uncertainty, instability, fluctuation of values. And in this unstable condition of prices, profiteers find their easy opportunity to take advantage, boosting some things higher than others.

But while the fundamental cause of dear prices is cheap money, it does not follow that it would be a good thing for the country to reduce high prices by making money dearer. If we reduce high prices that way we will not only reduce the cost of the things we have to buy, but we will reduce earnings, with which alone we can buy the things we want. The prices of goods and of all kinds of labor engaged in production and trade will fall together as the price of the dollar goes up. Everybody who has skill, intelligence and labor to sell will suffer loss, some more and some less. And everybody who has money on hand or credits outstanding, or loans, stocks or bonds, or other securities that bring in approximately fixed dividends, will be better off.

Cut the quantity of the circulation in two, make the dollar worth twice as much as it is now, and everybody who is rich and enjoy[illegible] earnings of capital will be very much richer, an[illegible]ybody who is poor, or in such moderate circum[illegible]es that he lives only on his labor or others' goods [illegible]h he has to sell from day to day, will be poorer, a[illegible]verybody who owes a new debt will find his deb[illegible]oubled.

So deflating the curr[illegible]y will not in itself get us out of our troubles, but mig[illegible] lead to worse.

REDUCTION in the price to the farmer for wheat, while other high prices stand, can never afford much relief to the public, while to the farmer it can only mean disaster and discouragement and result in less wheat-raising and still higher wheat. There is no profiteering in raising wheat at $2.26 a bushel, though there may be in selling it as flour at $14 a barrel. The many government investigations going on may disclose to exactness where the profits attach between the farmer and the consumer. Nor is it likely that the big profiteering will all be found in the little corner grocery.

If the general condition of business is to be really improved the farmer must be helped, not hurt. About one-half of the people of the United States are engaged in agricultural pursuits. The total capitalization of agriculture in America amounts to more than $50,000,000,000. Farming is the greatest single industry, men and money engaged in it considered, that we have—or ever will have, it is safe to say.

And yet every other industry enjoys the advantage of a better organized, more liberal and more readily available system of financing than the farming industry.

In this period of reconstruction the American farmer needs money on long terms and on reasonable conditions if he is to make his full contribution to the achievements of the country.

And yet bankers with a few intelligent exceptions, shy at that soundest of securities and make generous loans upon security that is not half so valuable.

In this crisis in the affairs of the world it is not only our duty but our opportunity to finance the world. But in financing the world we must not forget that the American farmer needs to be financed; that the American farm is the best security and the best investment in the world.

THERE is sense and promise in the plan for control of wheat exports presented by Julius H. Barnes, director of the United States Grain Corporation.

For the past four months American bread grains have been sold to European buyers willing to pay more than the guaranteed price of $2.26 a bushel. A large proportion of these purchases have been for export at higher price than that fixed for America. We have been sending wheat, meat and other food supplied to Europe at the rate of about $340,000,000 worth for the year. We are facing a material reduction in the season's crop, which a few weeks ago was estimated at the bumper total of 1,200,000,000 bushels. The shrinkage for North America is estimated by Mr. Barnes at 400,000,000 bushels. But the soil of America will still yield enough wheat to feed every American, and there will be a surplus of 300,000,000 bushels available for export.

What is needed is a careful adjustment of the supply to make sure that America's need shall be met first. Such a measure of foresight is essential "for the protection of our home requirements," as Director Barnes puts it.

And what is true of wheat is true of every other form of food supply. Manufacturers of agricultural implements are turning down foreign orders because they see the wisdom of meeting the home demand first.

IN VIEW of the great agitation over the high cost of food, the Department of Justice announces that suits are to be brought against the five big packers. The inference obviously expected to be drawn is that the successful termination of these suits will result in a lowered cost of food. Such an inference is unwarranted.

It is quite believable that the action against the packers may reveal some grave misuse of their power. It is no doubt true that the capital invested in the business is turned over many times in the course of a year; but that does not alter the fact that the element of profit in each individual operation is so small that its elimination would never be noticed on any family's meat bill.

It is doubtless a good thing that the Department of Justice should undertake its suits. The packers have been the objects of a long and violent campaign of attacks by the Federal Trade Commission, and the charges made, which have always received wide publicity, have tended to undermine public confidence in the accused. If the packers are innocent, here is their formal chance to prove it in court; if they are guilty, the sooner the country knows it the better.

REVISED EUROPE AT CLOSE RANGE

By NEVIN O. WINTER

Author of "Poland of Today and Yesterday," etc.

TWO-THIRDS of Europe is in process of transition. It is resolving itself into small states similar to its condition a century ago. Then there were half a dozen Italys and more than a score of Germanys. Today, the old Hapsburg empire is unrecognizable. There are three states wholly carved out of it, while the increased Rumania, and Serbia, now known as Jugoslavia, and rehabilitated Poland have dug deeply into her vitals. Likewise inchoate Ukraini loudly demands a portion. One can not even prognosticate with certainty the appearance of the Russia of the future, and stranger things have happened within historic times than the breaking up of Germany into smaller units numbering anywhere from two to six. Here in Vienna, where I am writing this letter in the midst of these tremendous changes, one gains rather more vivid impressions than by study at long range.

With the birth of new and rebirth of older nations, serious problems have arisen. With the resurrection of the somewhat dormant spirit of nationalism, there has also come into existence national ambition and national jealousy. No one realizes this more than the members of the Peace Conference, whose peace and serenity of mind are daily harassed with these issues. But the observant traveler has practical experience with it almost every day. Judging from a distance, one would naturally think that a spirit of good will, mutual forbearance and willingness to cooperate would develop. Experience quickly dispels this delusion. Exactly the opposite is the sad truth. There is an absolute absence of what might be termed team work.

Each new state struggles along as best it can, hemmed in by jealous and unsympathetic neighbors. The officials are generally men inexperienced in public affairs and they are never certain of their tenure of office. The election machinery has not been fully developed, so that the natural radical and conservative elements have not had an opportunity to fully test their comparative strength. Hence practically the only way to dispose of an unsatisfactory government is by force. This is called revolution, and it is. We at home revolt through our election machinery. When economic conditions get bad, we generally turn out the party in power at the next election. Here, where economic conditions do not improve after a few months, a new government is likely to force itself into office. Just now, and until the Peace Conference settles boundary disputes, this seems to be the only way of showing dissatisfaction.

Each country wants its own and wants it badly but seems not greatly interested in its neighbor. Let me make this more vivid by illustration. Trieste was the principal port of Austria-Hungary. It was the funnel through which the surplus agricultural and industrial products were shipped. Likewise the reverse operation distributed the imports over the country. Today, all the resultant states are severed from this port, for it is now in Italian possession. The Food Commission has experienced endless trouble in distributing its receipts to Czechoslovakia, German Austria, Hungary and Jugoslavia. As I write, the Italian border is absolutely closed. It was necessary for the Food Commission to bring direct official pressure upon Italy to secure the unimpeded passage of food trains which a generous country had provided to relieve human distress.

The Austro-Hungarian railways were practically all state-owned, and much of the trouble above described has arisen through this fact. Each new state has endeavored to appropriate as much of the rolling equipment as possible. This explains the reluctance of a state to permit its cars and engines to leave its borders. To obviate this difficulty the Food Commission has attempted a novel but very practical measure. This is to induce the different governments to turn over as much rolling stock as possible, and then stamp "U. S. A." upon each car. On the commission's part, the return of each identical car is guaranteed when the need has ended. These letters are to be respected exactly as the Red Cross emblem. An officer is then stationed at each border who checks each ingoing and outgoing car, so that an accurate account is preserved of their movements.

There is a surplusage of stocks of certain things in most of these countries which could be used in an interchange of commodities. Yet everybody looks toward the United States for everything, and wonders why all demands are not met at once. They do not stop to consider the transportation. For instance, Czechoslovakia possesses a large amount of sugar, yet her neighbors look to America for this necessity. Rumania contains vast quantities of oil, and one section at least of Serbia has large quantities of food. Jugoslavia could furnish much meat. But none of the statesmen appear to consider these practical facts when they demand similar supplies from America, four or more thousand miles away. Transportation would be comparatively simple if the boundaries were only kept open.

The money situation is another serious problem. Each country has endeavored to secure as much of the former national currency as possible. On some of the borders the passengers are searched for hidden currency and even foreigners are frequently asked how much they are carrying out of the country. Several of the states have stamped the old currency secured. As a result, the currency has a varying value, and the traveler is kept busy exchanging money and endeavoring to avoid leaving one state with money which may be practically worthless a few miles away. This fact contributes its share to the troubles of the general situation. Czechoslovakian money stands a trifle higher than its neighbors, but it is not worth more than one-third what the Austrian currency was prior to the world conflagration. Until these countries have established a gold reserve or foreign credit, they will engage in international commerce at a fearful disadvantage.

At the present time, Hungary is probably in the most deplorable plight. A Hungarian statesman informed me that his country was blockaded on all sides. Fortunately, Hungary is in a better position for food, outside of fats (being almost wholly an agricultural country), but it needs other things badly. "The Rumanians are occupying our forests and mines and we have little fuel," said this statesman. The railroad from Budapest to Vienna is the only through communication open to the world just now, and there is only one train a day between these former twin capitals. Many trains have been abandoned in the country because of the fuel shortage. The factories are idle for the same reason. The strict blockade against Hungary now is partly political, to prevent the spread of Bolshevism. The dearth of fuel is a most serious problem in this disintegrated empire and throughout the Balkans. In Prague, the family ration is only about seventy pounds per week. The hotels fire up their plants only about two hours a day. One can obtain a hot bath only one day each week. In Vienna there has been no heat in the hotels during the coldest days of the winter. The consumer can only use gas two half-hours a day for cooking. He can burn one electric light in one room for four hours a day. That the resumption of industry and normal transportation lags is not surprising.

The distressing food conditions prevailing in many places have not been exaggerated. The actual loss of life may not have been so great, but there has undoubtedly been a decreased vitality and endurance. The absence of fats is most noticeable. The soups are tasteless, with all evidence of fats or oils in them wholly lacking. People crave such meats as ham and bacon as a child craves candy. Vienna is probably in the worst position for food. Some of the restaurants have been without meat for five weeks. Living is not expensive for the foreign visitor who has gold to exchange, but for the people whose wages are paid in the cheap and fluctuating currency of these countries, it is terribly high.

TERVENTION MEANS DISASTER O PROTESTANTISM IN MEXICO

HE growth of Protestantism in Mexico, under all the handicaps of eight years of revolution and economic unrest, is one of the most 'marked manifestations of the new freedom ught and activity which accompanied the ow of the old Cientifico government.

co, for the first time since its settlement by nish conquerors, is released from the incubus state church with its powerful religio-political of administrative affairs.

than that, there is in effect a policy of en-ement of Protestant religious development, has been officially recognized by the inclusion umber of representatives of the Protestant inations in the central government.

ation for intervention in Mexico by the United is greatly deplored by the American missionaries ligious leaders who have found their field for below the Rio Grande. These men and women ave devoted years to the propagation of Protes-n among Mexicans, and who are just now g the full fruits of their labors, see in interference part of Washington the utter destruction of ist good they have accomplished.

feeling is strongly expressed by a prominent tant Mexican minister, who writes:

TERVENTION in Mexico by the United tates would mean the destruction of all Ameri-ission work. For many years past the Mexican stant ministers have been accused of being t with Yankee gold. We have, however, wed our pride and continued in the employ nerican mission boards, because we believed boards were representative of the best Christian and were trying to give to Mexico the pure l of Christ, our country's greatest need.

hen the Mexican revolution began, the Prot-t churches threw themselves into it almost mously because they believed the program of evolution represented what these churches had preaching through the years, and that the uph of the revolution meant the triumph of the el.

here were some entire congregations who, led eir pastors, volunteered for service in the revo-nary army, the men going to the front, the women ing them up at home.

Many Protestant preachers are now prominent e Mexican government. The people of Mexico seen that the Protestants were in favor of the ution and were willing to fight for its program. he liberal element have come, therefore, to have w respect for and a deep interest in the cause of gelical Christianity. Never in the history of ico has there been such eagerness to hear the el. All our meetings have been crowded to the s. This is true of churches in Mexico City, Puebla, dalajara, Monterey, and virtually all the other s in the country.

OW what will be the result if intervention comes from the United States?

In the first place, frankly, the Mexican Protestant isters would be the first to place themselves in le array against the invaders. They will be d in the very front in the defense of their country. There would be two reasons for this. The first atriotic. These ministers believe that patriotism ne of the first duties of the Christian. They do believe their country ought to be invaded by eigners. They will fight to the bitter end to end it. Although conditions have been bad, yet rybody knows they are improving all the time, our Christian work is receiving more favor than as ever received before.

'Secondly, our pride would force us into the nt ranks. We have suffered a long time this taunt other Mexicans that we have been bought with nkee gold. In order to prove this was not true, t we are true Mexicans at heart and willing to e our lives for our country, we would take the first portunity to show our patriotism.

"Intervention in Mexico would set back Christian rk in Mexico a hundred years.

"While Americans might say they were acting for e good of Mexico, Mexicans would never believe They believe they have a right to work out their n salvation with spiritual help from their Christian ighbors. Now that American mission boards have ranged to give this help in a larger measure and the portunities for preaching the Gospel are so great would be an immeasurable crime for the American ople to make war on Mexico."

HE new freedom that has come to Mexico with the permanent and definite overthrow of the d reactionary elements, which involved at the same me the separation of church and state, has had much do with the development of the Protestant movement in all parts of the country. In the days of the elder Diaz something like one-half the meager wages of the peon went to support the government and its church appanage. There was no suggestion of free-will offering or of independence of thought. Property, education, political preferment, were the perquisites of the church's supporters.

Agitation in the United States for intervention has taken account only of the possible danger to insecurely entrenched material rights—oil properties, mines and ranches obtained under concessions from the Cientificos.

The Carranza government has enacted laws and published decrees which make the status of these properties uncertain; but even the most bitter critics are willing to admit that these laws are based on a desire to restore to the Mexican people rights which are inherently theirs and were alienated for the enrichment of foreign syndicates and of favored politicians.

The Carranza policies are plain, and in the last analysis they motivate for the good of Mexico, rather than for alien people. In other words, so far as material things go, Mexico will be developed first for the benefit of the Mexican people.

In questions of religion, however, all faiths have been welcomed, and the monopoly of one has been broken. In the more than one-half of the republic of Mexico now under the control of the central government, this policy has been strictly enforced. And as more and more of the territory comes under the influence of the Carranza authorities, religious freedom has been extended coincident with the suppression of banditry, the resumption of business, restoration of transportation facilities and the amelioration of the condition of the starving, suffering peon.

In a very true sense, evangelical Christianity has followed the revolution. It is to foster the spread of evangelism that the Christian leaders of Mexico demand the right of self-determination of their destiny.

Protestant Unity in Mexico

By HARRY FARMER

DURING the years of revolution our Church has gone forward. This is due largely to the faithfulness of the missionaries and the perseverance under great trials of the Mexican preachers. In the midst of the days of revolution and unheard-of high prices, self-support has grown apace.

Our large Gante Church in Mexico City is actually raising toward its own expenses the large sum of five thousand pesos a year, and has a staff of five preachers and as many lay workers. Churches and schools are being erected and maintained with only one-fourth help coming from the mission. Our boys' and girls' schools are full, much beyond the capacity of the buildings available or the ability of the teachers to care for them. Our only hospital at Guanajuato is almost alone in its ministrations to more than a million people. Its usefulness is greatly handicapped by the limited support we are now able to give it.

Everywhere we met with a kind reception on the part of the Mexican officials and people, who are interested in our work and doing what they can to help us.

The editor of a large daily in Mexico City was a former Methodist preacher and entertained us royally at his home.

The governor of one of the largest states is also a Methodist.

The director of the large preparatory school in Mexico City is a Presbyterian.

We attended a father and son banquet at the Y. M. C. A. with some six hundred present, where the addresses and activities reminded one of like affairs in the United States.

THE Regional Conference met in Mexico City for a week, and was attended by appointed representatives of the missions both from the United States and Mexico.

Plans for readjustment of mission boundaries, agreed upon in 1914, were consummated and the actual transfers began at once. In some instances a mission withdrew its entire work from certain states and entered others; in others, missions actually gave up territory without compensation.

The publishing houses combined to form a union press and union book depository, with a union religious weekly. The agent of the new publishing house was elected immediately and the presses will unite at once, with definite plans to abolish the present papers and begin the new venture.

It was a happy occasion, and the members of the conference planned together as Christian brethren without reference to the denominational appellations. No one talked of giving up, but all referred to the larger responsibilities they were assuming.

Our representatives in Mexico were never so enthusiastic about the future, and certainly there has never been a time in the history of the Church when we were so able to support them in a large program as the present.

THE devastation and destruction wrought by the revolution is everywhere apparent, as one views the demolished stations and warehouses along the track. Such houses as may be seen are in a state of ruin, and one wonders where and how the people live who come to the station selling their food, baskets, fruit, canes, hats, opals, etc. Most of the people seem poor and ignorant and many in abject want. Freezing cold as it is in the high altitudes, the boys and girls would come to the trains in the early mornings without the necessary rags to cover their nakedness. In Mexico City itself, where conditions are much better, as business is proceeding in its usual way, there are thousands who have no homes, and they are found sleeping in doorways, empty halls, and even on the sidewalks. One cannot turn without having a beggar's hand thrust at him. Two different organizations are at work caring for the homeless boys, and some attempt is made by the government to alleviate the condition of the outcasts.

Business is recovering in a wonderful fashion following the nine years of revolution. Oil wells are running, mines are opening, coffee plantations are being opened again, and the hemp fields of Yucatan again give work to thousands at a living wage. There is no banking business, except by some foreign concerns which conduct an entirely private business. Large inland cities have absolutely no bank privileges. All paper money, which had depreciated to almost nothing, has been repudiated, and only gold and silver are used, of which, however, there is a very fine coinage issued by the Carranza government.

Conditions are far from ideal, but they are approaching stability, and President Carranza has accomplished marvels in opening railroads and keeping them running, in guaranteeing some protection to all business. The new constitution is perhaps two drastic in some particulars, but matters of reform are now being introduced, and in time the laws will be as liberal as those of our own country. In seeking to escape from the thralldom of church and capitalism, harm was necessarily done both to business and religion, but the reaction is coming and better times are ahead.

President Carranza greeted representatives of Protestant missions warmly and expressed his delight and satisfaction at the work we were doing and the enlarged programs under way. He will give every assistance in his power, especially in the establishment of schools and hospitals.

The Blue Triangle Near the Arctic Circle

An American Woman's Story of the Most Eventful Experience of Her Life

Miss Elizabeth Boies, director of Y. W. C. A. w in Russia

BEFORE I had talked to Miss Elizabeth Boies for fifteen minutes, I realized why she had neglected to write a book about Russia. She had been too busy doing things.

When she left the United States for Russia in April, 1917, it was in response to a cable from representative women asking the Y. W. C. A. to come to their country. Miss Boies went via Japan, ready to face whatever dangers the situation involved. Her last months in Russia were spent in service to the Allied armies stationed near the Arctic Circle. Here the Allied armies were holding a trackless forest. Ahead of them stretched the long, cold, sunless winter, with its dark, gloomy days, uncheered by mail or papers from home. And Archangel, the Arctic shipping port which was headquarters, furnished no amusements at all, except those which were created by home talent. In the whole district there were only nine American women, six of whom were Y. W. C. A. secretaries. And while these women were befriending and helping their Russian sisters—many of them refugees who came to Archangel for the summer and suddenly found an impassable front between them, their families and their padded winter coats—they were also supplying a bit of home for the five thousand American troops shut up in the frozen northland.

When the story of the great war is written the Y. W. C. A. hostess house will flit across some page, as hospitable as a latchstring always down, as homelike as an open fire and as much loved as a favorite book. And of all the hostess houses to the credit of the Association, none will deserve more praise than the little cabin in Archangel.

"The men drop in and stay and stay," says Miss Boies. "The chairs which we thought were almost impossible, they call easy. And the three scraps of rugs and the green reading-lamp which we picked up at auction they treat with a strange and appealing tenderness. A ruble may not be worth the paper it is printed on in the world's financial circles, but at the Sign of the Blue Triangle it will buy a cup of cocoa or coffee and two or three cakes or biscuits."

But the services of the Y. W. C. A. secretaries stationed in Russia are not limited to this one hostess house. They also have a share in the work of the three Y. M. C. A. canteens, one of which is stationed in the city proper, and the others at either somewhat distant end, by names Smolny and Solombala. When the American men found their own countrywomen serving coffee and baking-powder biscuits and jam, life immediately took on a brighter aspect. "You are an American, aren't you?" they'd say, and then burst into conversation, for while to the Russian soldier the Y. M. C. A. hut is only a place to eat and rest, to the American men it is at once a club and a taste of home.

The story of a journey to the railroad front paints the picture of a brand-new kind of army camp.

"As trains in Russia do not exert themselves very strenuously," writes the Y. W. C. A. secretary who made the trip, "we were anywhere from nine to twenty-four hours reaching our destination. But we were fortunate in our accommodations, having been invited into the English ambulance car which was returning to the front. We lighted our candle, melted the end and stuck it in a packing-box, opened a can of salmon and a package of crackers, and had tea in the good old-fashioned Russian way."

This camp at the railroad front is composed of four tracks or sidings. One track is always kept free for the movement of troops, but on the other three are rows and rows of funny little box-cars. Back in the woods there are six blockhouses built of logs, with intersecting lanes cut through the trees in four directions. Each company or platoon has its own set of cars and forms a little community. The cars are really very comfortable, being double-lined and well heated by cast-iron stoves. From ten to eighteen men live in each car, and there is a well-fitted-up cook car for each platoon. A big steel mail car in this camp is the special property of the Y. W. C. A. At one end is the canteen, at the other the never-silent phonograph and a small compartment containing the library and a big boiler for serving cocoa.

Russian peasant women washing their clothes at the river's edge

Although Miss Boies talks first of all of the soldiers and what the Y. W. C. A. is doing for them, she has much to say about the Russian women among whom she worked establishing recreation centers and holding classes. Only a tiny minority of Russian women are educated. At best, they have a few months' schooling. In a village of fifty homes, two simple rooms must hold all the pupils. Sometimes there are adult night classes, but they are a mere drop in the bucket of ignorance. The men go to school for three or four terms of a few months each. The women go fo or two terms, or not at all. There is no compu education, no places for schooling, no teacher books. But there is a great reaching out for and pamphlets of all sorts.

For Miss Boies and the secretaries were actual exa of what keeping after a could accomplish. These w in a strange land fighting ag the terrible odds and winning instead of remaining comfort at home, were eye-opener Western methods. And ye spite of their lack of tenacity, ignorance, and their fatalism Russian women are the co vative element of the cou While the men were asking freedom, the women laid rail tracks and sidings, shoveled and engaged in all kinds of ual labor.

The creed of the Russian man is the Eastern one of abasement. This explains large number of suicides have recently taken place among them. The sians hold life lightly. As Miss Boies talks about women, one gets a series of vivid mental pictu The peasant woman, the factory worker, the dent, the business girl and the occasional leader before us like films moving across a canvas.

The typical day for the peasant woman starts the dark morning with the milking of the cow ends after a crowded day with more milking.

"The Russian factory woman, with her bare f loose skirt and sacklike blouse, isn't very attract to look at," says Miss Boies.

But it is among the business girls that she f that the Y. W. C. A. can do its best work when t day dawns which brings something vaguely approa ing order into Russia.

PROMINENT among G. A. R. auxiliaries at the big annual encampment this year at Columbus, Ohio, September 7-13, are the annual conventions of the National Woman's Relief Corps. They are great rallies of patriotic women pledged to patriotic service. Among many other interesting endeavors, the Woman's Relief Corps maintains its nine-room cottage in Andersonville Prison Park. Generous gifts have been made to the Southern Memorial Fund and to the Red Cross Building for memorial windows.

Although the Woman's Relief Corps loses by death several thousand members each year, its membership is still very large, there being over 160,000 in 2,715 corps. Its annual receipts total over $35,000 and its disbursements for relief are over $30,000 a year.

The chief aims of this devoted body of women, from its beginning in 1883, have been to provide relief for the Civil War soldier and his dependents; to aid the G. A. PROBLEMS OF CONSCIENCE A BUSINESS MAN MUST FACE

HENRY P. DAVISON Interviewed by MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE room was large, rich, perfectly appointed. The walls were finished in dark, splendidly carved wood; the hangings were of a dull green and gold brocade that melted into the ral color scheme. The shade on the lamp was -colored, too, and the furniture was mahogany, lstered in dark leather. Even the rug upon the , an old Persian rug, with a touch of faint, faded -color in the depths of it, was exactly right.

Ir. Henry P. Davison matched the room. He, was large and well dressed and rather imposing. suit was of blue serge—his shoes were brown. wore only two pieces of jewelry—a heavy seal on his left hand and a pearl pin in his scarf. But simplicity was an expensive simplicity—he looked the typical big business man. And his office was a dramatically right setting.

I have noticed, often, that really important people are never too ceremonious. Mr. Davison was not at all the pompous man that one would expect the head of a great corporation to be. Indeed, he was not at all formal as he shook hands with me and pulled forward one of the heavy chairs for me to sit in. And when I asked my leading question he laughed frankly—as any real man with a real sense of humor would laugh.

“Problems of conscience that a business man must face?” he repeated after me. “Really, I can't let you interview me on that subject!” he laughed again, and —“By outsiders,” he said, “Wall Street is considered something of a bugaboo. And the heads of Wall Street firms are considered ruthless!” He paused.

I waited, silently. I have found that waiting silently often helps. Women aren't expected to wait silently. After a moment Mr. Davison spoke again.

“Last Sunday evening,” he said, “I was talking to a friend of mine—also the head of a large firm. We were talking about the people who work for us. After we had been at it for some time my friend suddenly laughed.

“‘If our conversation should be quoted,’ he said, ‘no one would believe it! We aren't supposed to be interested in economic conditions. And we are expected to forget about business on holidays and Sundays.’ I agreed with him. No one would have believed it!”

HE paused again, and again I waited. I was not disappointed.

“A good many people,” said Mr. Davison, “think that the development of conscience in business is a recent departure. It isn't. Big business has always had a conscience. If it hadn't it wouldn't be big business!”

“Then,” I questioned, “it's unnecessary to ask the head of any big business about his problems in conscience, isn't it? Because if he didn't meet those problems squarely, he wouldn't——”

Mr. Davison interrupted me.

“You're quite right,” he said. “To be really big in any line, a man must meet his problems squarely. One crooked deal will give a firm a bad reputation. So the head of a firm must be sure to keep away from all crookedness.

“Some time ago twenty men from all over the country met with me in conference. They were afraid of Wall Street—rather afraid, too, of me. And I saw that they were. So the first time I had occasion to speak to them, I said: ‘Let us, at the beginning of this conference, make up our minds that nothing but the absolute truth must be spoken. If we do that we'll never have any difficulties or any misunderstandings.’ And we never did. Those men went away with an entirely new impression of big business.”

Abruptly changing the subject, I asked a question that had been in my mind ever since Mr. Davison's first sentence.

“Can the head of a great corporation keep in touch with all the detail of his business?” I asked. “Can he manage to be interested in all of the cogs of his machine as thoroughly as the head of a smaller firm can do it?”

Mr. Davison smiled as he answered.

“If the head of a great corporation cannot keep in touch with those details,” he said, “he ceases to be of value to that corporation. If he is not personally interested in the least of his employees he is not a big enough man to be at the head of anything.” He laughed, and—“I'm just back from overseas,” he said rather abruptly. “I've been with the Red Cross. Among other things I've made plans for child welfare. Do you suppose that those plans would be of any value if I didn't know how to relieve the suffering of a sick baby?”

A Bit of Property in the Himalayas

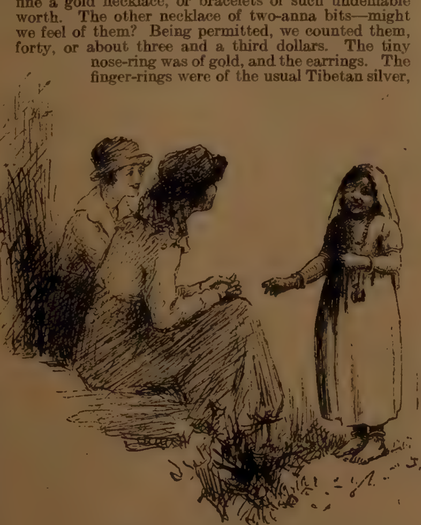
A Missionary's Quaint Account of An Informal Meeting with a Little Native in the Lower Himalayas

A WEE barefoot girl in blue velvet, she stood where our path turned to go farther up the mountain. Above were the heights of the er Himalayas, toward which we were climbing; ow lay the town of Darjeeling, beautiful indeed, at this outlying point only a cluster of dirty ive huts, with dirtier inhabitants. The huts had wn fewer, and we were breathing more freely the untain air as we turned the bend, when we stopped rt at sight of the sweet picture in our way. A le girl, hardly more than a baby—brown cheeks, ooth and round like those of our own little folk; es as sweet in their stare from under a grown up ad-dress as eyes of white babies from under dainty nnets; a gleam of necklace on the dark velvet ess, a quaint long skirt just showing tiny anklets d bare brown feet—so much we saw—before the e wild thing had scampered to cover, and, from e vantage of a dirty dooryard, turned to stare at again.

Laughing, we sank on the resting-bench at the rrow roadside, and then suddenly lost all sight little girl, of heathen hut, of things human, as ere burst on our view the glorious snowy range, ith queenly Kinchenjunga lifting a proud summit ove the stain of earth. Near us, wooded hills erged their green into more distant blue, and is in turn led on to the deep blue of far-away ountains. At last all melted into limitless er, when sheer in the heavens, as if held by e invisible Infinite Hand, rose the mighty nge of everlasting snows. Cold white crags istened like marble under the tropical sun, and ray shadows crept into darker gloom. Far at e ends of the snowy structure, eternal plains emed to draw to heavenly fields, while jutting oints and peaks in the center were steps leading o Kinchenjunga's height. Was the great white hrone just beyond?

IT was a familiar word that brought us to earth. “Salaam!” and there stood the wee naiden. Fortunately knowing the hill-folk word for little sister,” we responded “Salaam, bini,” and ere rewarded by a dimpled smile. Much of her hyness had apparently disappeared while she had een studying these strange white folk, staring so ddly into the air, oblivious to the tinkling of her racelets. The remaining shyness fled at the “little ister” word; now we should become acquainted. own knowledge of the hill tongues was all too ant, and the child knew even less of Hindustani, smiles and signs and mutual good-will go far.

Might she feel of the shiny ribbons on our walking-blouses? Yes, indeed, she could—to her great delight. As she thus examined us, we also studied her. The square of cotton cloth folded into the miniature head-dress—it surely resembled a dish-towel. Anything but common, however, was her other clothing, showing that she was of well-to-do parents, or perhaps the pet of a family who lavished all decorations upon her. True, the velvet dress was not so rare, being loved by all Tibetans; but seldom had we seen so fine a gold necklace, or bracelets of such undeniable worth. The other necklace of two-anna bits—might we feel of them? Being permitted, we counted them, forty, or about three and a third dollars. The tiny nose-ring was of gold, and the earrings. The finger-rings were of the usual Tibetan silver, and the anklets also, which were soldered on to stay until the small ankles should need larger ones. They looked tiny enough, but we knew something of them—that they were solid silver, and at first must have rubbed and chafed. Do they hurt, we asked. Oh no, she said, and surveyed her small ankles with pride, for already, with older Indian sisters, she sensed that much decoration proved her a prized bit of property.



Smiles and signs and mutual goodwill go far

Her little dress was actually made in Mother Hubbard style; but for its length and the being of velvet, it might have been our own years ago. Familiar, too, was her little bunch of flowers (a child's love the world over)—a violet, a weed and a bright leaf. A tiny sack hung about her neck—would she show us what was in it? Ah, a half-eaten sweet potato and a few grains of parched corn, none too clean.

BUT time was speeding on, and we should now be further up the mountin. We started to go, and then stopped for the longing in the brown eyes. “Should we try to leave the message of Jesus?” We wondered. Surely the soul looked out from those eyes, asking for more than we had given. With some difficulty we began, trying to make her understand that we were talking of God, when suddenly with a flash of intelligence she turned and pointed to the Buddhist monastery on the hillside. Yes, yes, she understood. But, we said, God is here—pointing to our hearts—and there—pointing above the beautiful mountains. God is good, God loves us. No, no, she denied, with a look of fear. “Shall we tell you about Jesus?” we asked. But her interest now was drawn by a bright ribbon and the lesson was ended.

Then we must start on. Reluctantly she responded to our good-byes. In the path we looked around again—the glistening mountains that spoke of a holy and loving God; the wee girl, unmarred as yet by the devil's touch, which soon would come from the huts below to blight her womanhood. A turn in our path, and we saw her no more. Sadly we continued up the mountain, thinking of the dear little girl, type of the many human souls who, because of few laborers, would never hear the sweet Jesus-story. “How then shall they call on Him in whom they have not believed? and how shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a preacher?”

FLORENCE A. BOYCE.

UNCLE EBEN'S NEPHEW

By ALBERTO ADELLMAN BENNETT

"I THINK your Uncle Eben has something on his mind."

Aunt Martha was readjusting the flowers on her new Easter hat, with a fashion magazine propped up before her. She distrusted the judgment of the new milliner who had lately come to the village, and she was trying to make the hat look like the picture in the magazine.

"And I think, Bertram," she went on, "you had better let him talk with you before you go back to college."

She had mothered the orphan son of her husband's brother since he was seven years old, and one of her tasks had been to keep a good understanding between her slow-spoken, childless husband and this reticent boy who loved books, and who was working his way through the second year in college.

They met in the woodshed. Uncle Eben had gone there to file a saw, and Bertram came in to clean and oil a pair of tan shoes. Uncle Eben looked over his glasses at the shoes and scowled. He opened his mouth for a moment as if to speak, then the file resumed its squeaking across the saw. The squeaking kept growing a little harder, until finally Uncle Eben stopped and spoke.

"How much longer do you reckon on going to school?"

"I have two more years after this one," replied Bertram.

The file squeaked on the saw for several minutes, then suddenly he spoke again.

"What are you getting out of your studying so much?"

Bertram was puzzled to know what to answer. Uncle Eben's education had only been to the end of the common school, and it was not easy to explain what a college course was.

"Just now," he said after a moment's hesitation, "we are studying trigonometry and surveying."

"Humph!" and there was a note of scorn in Uncle Eben's voice. He resumed his work with the file, then presently he stopped again.

"You know this farm is going to belong to you when I get through with it?"

"You told me that when I was nine years old."

"Well, what are you going to do about it?"

"I don't know. Perhaps I'll come back and live on it, some time. It may be I'll take a course in an agricultural college, and pick up some of the new ways of farming."

"Another college, eh?"

The saw-filing and the shoe-polishing went on for a while, and when Uncle Eben spoke again, it was with considerable emphasis.

"I think the sooner you take hold of this farm the better, if you are ever going to. I'm getting rather old, and I'm about ready to let you take the lead. What good will any more of that trigonometry and surveying do you when you come back here?"

It was Bertram's turn to hesitate, and it was sometime before he spoke. Plainly enough, Uncle Eben's words meant that he should leave college and come home to work on the farm, and he was puzzled to know why Uncle Eben should speak in this way. The farm was not running down, the land was kept in good cultivation, and there was no lack of labor, for a hired man had been engaged for the season. Uncle Eben stood looking over his glasses for an answer. Bertram laid down his shoe and took a step nearer.

"Is it going to be difficult for you to let me have money enough to finish my college course? I am earning a part of my board now, and perhaps I can do a little more next year."

Uncle Eben gave a little snort of contempt. "Money! I reckon I can find ways of getting money enough, if it's necessary for you to stay in college. I promised your father when he died that I'd bring you up right and give you an education, and I've no idea of backing out of my bargain."

"Then I can't understand what you mean by wanting me to leave college and go to work on this farm."

"Why, I mean for you to take hold of this farm and make a man of yourself. You are old enough to begin to show the world that you are going to be a man."

Bertram was more puzzled than before, and Uncle Eben laid down his file.

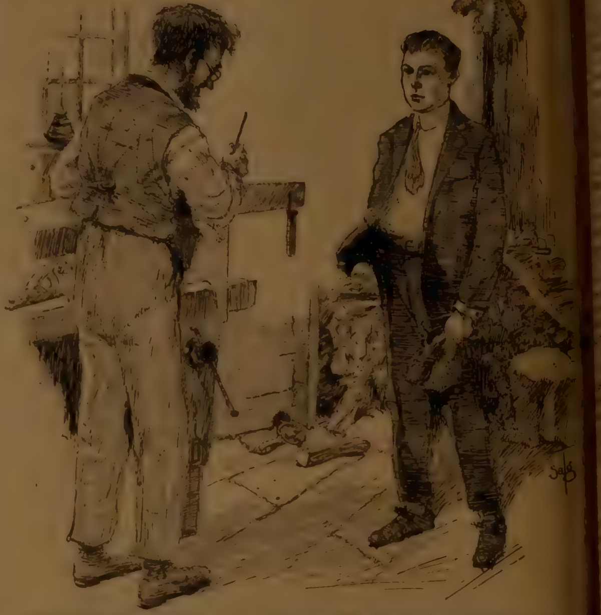
"I've let you have your own way about going to school, just as I promised your father I would, and I've let you buy your own clothes just as you wanted to, and all that. And here you come home with the most outlandish things—there ain't another young man comes to church looking the way you do."

"Yes, but," Bertram began in astonishment, "can't you see——"

"Green-colored clothes," interrupted Uncle Eben. "Yes, green clothes, and yaller shoes, and purple neckties, and a cap that's all befront and no behind, sticks way out over your face—how you look! I thought first you'd got cheated in buying those clothes and I was plumb ashamed of ye. Then I thought may be you'd bought them because the storekeeper couldn't sell them to any one else and let you have them real cheap to get rid of them; I didn't say anything, but the pants was too big for ye, and you had to keep them turned up around the bottom all the time. Then when I gave ye the money to buy a better suit because I felt sorry for ye, I swan! you went and bought a new suit worse than the other. It beats me! Then here you come home this time with a queer-looking hat and a striped ribbon around it. Yes, sir; a woman's brown and white ribbon tied around it for a hat-band. I don't know what you'll do next."

Uncle Eben took up the file again.

"That thing might be all right for boys in blouses," he added, "but you don't see any of the men that come from the city dressed that way. I think it is about time for you to quit some of that foolishness, and begin to show the folks that you're going to be a man."



They met in the woodshed. . . . He opened his mouth for a moment as if to speak; then the file resumed its squeaking across the saw Bertram had been feeling very serious, not understanding what his uncle meant, but now the shadow of a smile began to play around the corners of his mouth.

"I don't expect to be a boy all my life," he said frankly. "If you'll let me be a boy for a while longer, I'll promise you I'll be all a man by and by."

Uncle Eben was pacified but not satisfied. In his younger days he had had dreams and ambitions, the main part of which was to be a man among men. Circumstances had prevented him from fulfilling his dreams in the larger way, and when his brother's son came to him he determined that his own unaccomplished ambitions should be made good in this boy when he became a man.

Uncle Eben realized to a certain extent that his own ways fell short. He tried not to be odd. He tried to do and be like other men, but there was a feeling of diffidence that often held him back. He was careful to wear good clothes when in public, and he insisted that his wife should be nicely dressed. He surreptitiously watched the clothing of the men who came from the city and tried to imitate them. When some strange man came to church, it gave him great satisfaction to compare his coat slyly with that of the stranger and find it made of the same kind of cloth. He craved to be a leader. He held little offices in the community organizations to which he belonged, and discharged his duties with pride, yet he never was able to launch out in the leadership which he wanted, and he was not entirely satisfied with the complacent esteem which his neighbors gave him. He had always wanted to do something that others could not do. And failing in this himself, he had hopes that Bertram might accomplish it, and by watching him he might find his satisfaction.

But Bertram was disappointing him. When he came home from college on his vacations, he did not do anything to attract the attention of the community. To be sure the correspondent of the county paper usually wrote that a collegian was visiting at the home of Eben Millberry, but that was all. Bertram seemed to have the same quiet, retiring disposition that Uncle Eben had been afflicted with, and apparently he was not trying to overcome it and step into a place of leadership. More and more Uncle Eben was becoming dissatisfied with Bertram's progress toward manhood. But Bertram's promise that he would begin to act like a man by and by, when he was through college, brought to Uncle Eben a measure of comfort for a while.

Along in May, just before planting time, David the hired man was taken with the hives and could not do much work. While Uncle Eben was fretting about the delayed work, because he always prided himself on being a little ahead of his neighbors with his crops, there came a letter from Bertram to Aunt Martha, asking if he might have some money to buy a baseball suit, because he had been given a place on the university team. Uncle Eben gave way to impatience, for the first time he refused to send him any.

"It's all right for what he wants in education," said, "let him do his trigonometry and surveying if wants to, which I can't see much use of, but th games ain't a regular part of the study, and I sha send him money for that."

Aunt Martha quietly took some money which had put away in her bureau, and sent it to Bertr for a baseball suit.

The hired man did not get any better, and o afternoon Aunt Martha found Uncle Eben at bench in the woodshed, blacking his boots. Th were his best boots, the ones he wore to church, a they squeaked when he went along the aisle taking the collection.

"Why, Eben Millberry!" she exclaimed; "what a you doing? Your best suit is laid out on a chair, a here you are blacking your boots. Tomorrow is Sunday."

"Don't you suppose I know it?" Uncle Eben spol a little testily.

"And there isn't any funeral as I know of. Wh in the world?"

"I'm going to college tomorrow, and the train go early."

"Well, I never! I'd like to know what's up?"

"I'm going to see what Bertram's a-doing no I'm going to talk with some of the professors. If th trigonometry and surveying ain't too important, may be he can just as well come home a while an help out in the planting, seeing David is used up. never had a hired man taken with the hives in plantin time before. Bertram might just as well be doin some planting as to be doing those ball games, and i would be a mighty help to me, too."

Aunt Martha knew Uncle Eben too well to dare t make any opposition to his purpose, but in her hear she secretly feared the result of his sudden trip t college.

The college town offered unusual sights for a ma who knew only a country village, and Uncle Eben le himself stop to look at the store windows, but he kep his eye out for Bertram's greenish-brown suit, in cas he should be passing along the street. Presently he saw the watched-for color coming toward him, and he prepared himself to speak. But the young man wore eyeglasses and his face was pale; it was not Bertram. Then came two young men who seemed so nearly like Bertram that he looked from one to the other and could hardly determine till they were brushing past him. Next came half a dozen walking together, and he scanned their faces trying to recall Bertram's features more distinctly to make sure he was not one of them. Again and again as he made his way toward the college he met young men dressed as Bertram had been, and the color of their clothes were all the way ark brown to olive green. It seemed as if the vas full of Bertrams.

n he entered the college grounds and looked at issive buildings, a feeling of awe came to him made him almost confused. He felt as if he ntruding where he did not belong. "Mr. Millberry seems to be doing all right," he said businesslike voice. "He has never been up for line, he hasn't taken many of his cuts, and his ations are excellent. If he doesn't have anything nder him, I think perhaps he'll be in the upper of his class."

Here's a gentleman wants to see Milly. ke him down and do the honors."

At the fraternity house Uncle Eben was received y cordially. They told him Bertram was not there. had gone with the ball team to play a game with another college. When they found he was Bertram's uncle, they could not do enough for him. They insisted that he should stay to dinner with them. They put him in a great plush chair and sat down and related a lot of stuff to him, the most of which he could not understand because it was given with so much college slang and unfamiliar terms. The gist of it was that Milly was splendid at the bat, he was a freezer for a liner or a grounder, and in the last game but one he had won a whitewash by a fly on an incurve, when the scores were zero in the tenth, and two were out. They regarded Milly as a regular filbert on baseball.

At dinner they put him at Bertram's place at the table. Never in all his life had he felt so awkward as when eating dinner with those young men, and he wondered if Bertram could do as the others did all the time. They tried to make him feel at ease, and one of them took it upon himself to instruct the waiter in Uncle Eben's behalf. When he had gone away, after being heartily invited to come again, he was humiliated to remember that he had not thought to thank them for their hospitality. If they had not been so thoroughly gentlemanly in their conduct, he would have feared that they might be secretly laughing at his blunders. It was a magnificent place to be, where those young men were, but it oppressed him with a constant fear of doing something wrong, and it was a distinct relief to be walking on the street again, alone.

The train that he took to go home was the one that brought the fellows back from the ball game. He had not expected to see Bertram, but looking out of the window after he had taken his seat in the car, he saw the young men in their baseball suits, and a crowd of others filling the station platform. On a barrel stood Bertram, saying something to the crowd. Then he began to wave his arms as if beating time, and there came forth such a shout as Uncle Eben had never heard in his life. Again and again Bertram went through the motions with his arms, and every time came the college yell, like the beating of a gigantic drum. The train moved out with the young men still shouting for the victory at the ball game.

Aunt Martha usually waited for Uncle Eben to speak, after he had been away somewhere. It was always better to let him tell the story himself. But this time her anxiety for her nephew overcame her patience, and she put the question:

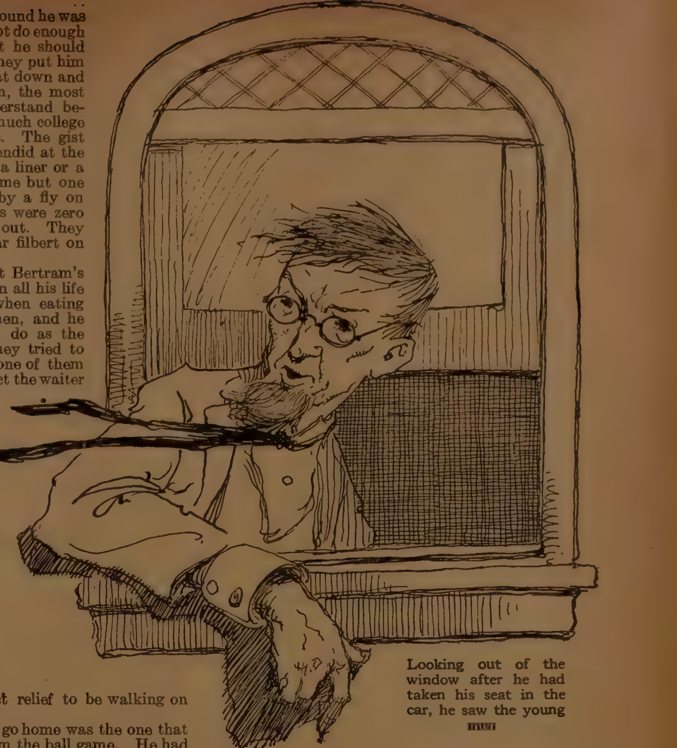
"Did you find Bertram?"

"No, but I saw plenty more just like him. They are all peas in the same pod up there."

"Is he coming home to work?"

"Not unless I'm taken sick myself, and I don't reckon I shall be."

Then after a few minutes he added: "I promised Brother William when he died that I'd help his little boy to be a man. If he can hold his way with those fellows up there, he's more of a man now than any Millberry I've ever seen before. I'm going to give him more money next year, so he won't have to work for his board. There's more than one way of being a man."



Looking out of the window after he had taken his seat in the car, he saw the young men

A Woman's Work in Arctic Siberia

The Amazing Adventure of This Young and Intrepid Lady Is Not Rivaled in the Life of Any Woman Living

IS to Miss Marie Antoinette Czaplicka, lecturer in anthropology at Oxford University, England, at we are indebted for our knowledge of the little known tribes that wander the barren wastes of Ar tic Siberia.

Miss Marie Antoinette Czaplicka

In 1906 Miss Czaplicka matriculated at the Russian government school at Libau, passing the examination for teacher of geography. From 1907 to 1910 she was a student of the Society for Promoting the Study of Science (Towarzystvo Kursow Naukowyeh Przyrodniczo-Matemayoznych), which was the Polish equivalent of the boycotted Russian University.

In 1910 Miss Czaplicka went with the expedition to the Caucasus, in the same year obtaining the Mianowski Research Scholarship at Warsaw for study abroad, this being an old endowment which for the first time has awarded a scholarship to a woman.

In 1912 she took the diploma in anthropology at Oxford. From 1912 to 1914 she was a research student at Oxford, working on the anthropology of Northern Asia, proving her capacity to lead in a profession in which few of her sex have ever distinguished themselves.

Miss Czaplicka is giving her life to the study of the history and ethnology of the races of Northern and Central Asia, trying to disentangle the complex problems of racial affinities, and to determine who were the Huns, Avars or Tartar tribes that at various times overran Europe and mixed with the Slavs and Central European peoples.

When the anthropological expedition under the joint auspices of the Oxford Committee and the University of Pennsylvania Museum was under discussion, Miss Czaplicka was selected to represent Oxford, and Professor H. U. Hall as the representative of the University Museum.

Profile view of the Yurak-Samoyed countenance

The expedition entered the Russian wilderness 2,500 miles east of Moscow at a place named Krasnoyarsk on the Yenisei River, which flows directly north to the Kara Sea, and established its headquarters after many weeks of arduous travel at Golchikha, 450 miles within the Arctic Circle. From this point treks of 3,000 miles were made to various points on the Big Low Tundra and Taimyr Peninsula in sledges drawn by reindeer. At Golchikha the sun does not fall below the horizon for eighty days during parts of May, June and July, and during the winter hundreds of miles were covered in a temperature below 80 degrees Fahrenheit.

In commenting on the Siberian expedition the London Standard gives a mildly humorous touch to its review: "Miss Czaplicka is a Polish lady with portentous titles like Fellow of the Royal Anthropological Institute and Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. Oxford sent her to Siberia. To ordinary people it would have been no joy ride—this expedition."

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

IN THESE heart-searching days it is not surprising that men are being led to distinguish between the customary outward form of religion and the thing itself; between the outer garment and the inner spirit.

Unfortunately this power of discernment does not come to all, for there are many who are satisfied with the semblance and never seek to realize its substance. They are content to go on living in a placid, uneventful way, with conscience asleep. As long as normal needs are met, there is no uplift to such existences. They seem to have no outlook beyond the momentary gratification of the desires for ease, comfort, sociability, and a sufficiency of means to put to rout the apprehension of poverty and suffering.

But something happens to disturb the placidity of such a life. Some dear one is called away by death, or there is a sudden reversal of fortune. It may be any one of a hundred happenings that arouses the conscience and brings the man face to face with the great vital facts of religion; God and the soul, life, death and the hereafter. It is an awakening which strips off the garment of formalism, leaving the soul naked and ashamed. All the hollowness of the past life is revealed, and its insufficiency is painfully impressed upon us. This is the opportunity to begin the ascent of the upward path, which, though it wind through thorns and briars, leads at last to the true road in which God meant that man should walk.

In his admirable book "The Soul in Suffering" Dr. Robert S. Carroll has expressed this thought:

"Rightwayness is the key-thought for righteousness. Whosoever earnestly follows truth in any of its aspects toward its Source, is living righteously. Ignorance, crudeness, coarseness cannot defeat the ultimate progress of him who continues on even one of the remote upward paths which lead to the Highway of Truth. Far away indeed he may be—he is on the right path. Religion exacts observance of the letter of law; righteousness is the orthodoxy of the soul. It is not creed nor doctrine, not the religion which excludes, but the righteousness which pervades one's relations with reality that develops character. Righteousness is inclusive; it seeks to save the good in every man; it is the fulness of our patience and sympathy; it is the capacity we have developed for service and self-sacrifice. The measure of our righteousness will ever be fixed in our attitude toward our fellow man."

We live in a time of universal change, when after the confusion of war the peace which the world desires can only come through men seeking toward God, who alone can bestow the highest good. But his blessings come only to those who strive to walk in the path he has appointed, who yield obedience to his laws and honor him in all things.

The national conscience has been awakened, and now that America may find its soul, we need a continent-wide revival of righteousness. The nation is already facing toward the King's Highway, and we thank God for it. Let us magnify his name and press forward.

THE GREATEST VALUE

THE "Churchman" in the Boston Transcript tells of a New England boy who won honors in school, who left his Christian home with high ideals and returned to it over twenty years later with wealth, position, influence, only to find, as he sat in his mother's garden and walked through the familiar rooms from which her body had lately been carried for the last long sleep, that all he had gained was valueless beside that which he had lost.

In gaining wealth and power he had lost his ideals and the faith of his early manhood. Then, at fifty, he had returned to the faith he had forgotten and had started again to realize the ideals that had been covered up by the joy of money-making and the pride of material achievement.

The world today is turning back to faith. Men who once considered religion good for women and children, a comfortable superstition that kept folks satisfied, are beginning to realize that every other value is transitory and that faith alone has values that abide. The last four years have proven the futility of human ambition, the powerlessness of purely human engagements, to bring peace or justice or a universal regard for right.

And faith again becomes the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things unseen. Only men strong in faith, mighty with God, can guide the world of today back from the verge of chaos to the firm security of ordered life and equal opportunity. Men of great faith have always been men of might, and men of worldly might are today becoming men of faith.

The Church has not always preached a man's Gospel. Men want action; they crave sacrifice; they seek a task worthy of their powers. The Gospel that soothes and comforts only, does not fit the day. Men, convinced as never before of the eternal worth of faith, must have a vigorous leadership that will challenge them to spiritual achievement and that will relate all lesser values to the overshadowing value of faith. With such leadership and with such men, the Church will rise to new heights of service and will proclaim as never before her commission from her King.

WILL IT BE A NEW EXODUS?

ALL indications point to a great transformation in progress in the Zionist movement. Nearly six months ago, doubt was freely expressed that the movement for reestablishing the ancient homeland in Palestine would receive really cordial support from a large proportion of the Jewish people scattered throughout the world. Now, within half a year, all is changed. In every land, Jews are now turning their eyes towards the historic seat of their race. Zionism has taken deep root, and so marked is the enthusiasm that it is now believed that a great multitude of the youths of the Hebrew race will set their faces towards Zion when the political status of Palestine is definitely fixed. Russia will doubtless furnish the largest supply of immigrants. Systematic arrangements are now under way for establishing agricultural, manufacturing and commercial relations between the Holy Land and other countries. Big banking interests will be fully represented and with ample capital. Poland, Bulgaria, Serbia and the Germanic States will each furnish its quota towards swelling this new Exodus. Even America, under whose liberal laws the race has prospered, will help to enlarge the flood, though not in the same volume as those states where bigotry, race hatred and persecution have made life hard for the Jewish people. In all the liberal lands they will hold the advantages they have won in finance and commerce, and will thus be able to render powerful aid in the work of rehabilitation and development, through their wealth and influence, from Syria to Egypt and from Jordan to the Mediterranean.

THE DAY OF THE YOUNG MAN

THE young man is having his turn. The boys are returning from the war determined to conquer in peace as they conquered in battle.

A distinct feature of the times will be the importance of the part taken in all great affairs, political, industrial, scientific and religious, by young men.

Wisdom and caution increase with old age; but ambition, purpose, enthusiasm and activity are perquisites of youth. And it is the prompt planning and the ready executing that are to count in the next decade more than ever before in world history.

Fame and position are made nowadays early in life, or else, the chances are, they are not made at all. Young men set their marks in whatever calling they choose and go upward to them in leaps and bounds. Most attain their places in the social plan before middle life. It is a period of electrical rapidity in all things.

GETTING CLOSER TO CHRIST

PROFESSOR Hutchins of Oberlin in one of his books tells of an Association secretary overseas who stood in his hut giving spiritual advice to soldiers who were leaving for the trenches. It was a pitchy dark night. One young soldier stepped out of the blackness and said: "I'm going to the trenches tonight. I have a Bible and I wish you'd mark some passages in it for me." Immediately half a dozen similar requests were made by others who were also going out into the dark to face death. They felt that they wanted to get close up to Christ that night—to feel that he was by their side. Then, whatever happened, they could go forward fearlessly to their duty.

In the great battle of life there are hours when we feel that we need to get closer to the Master—that we must feel the touch of his hand, the calming, reassuring influence of his presence.

The secret of the Christian's power lies in his daily walk with Jesus. His strength is renewed daily like the eagle's. He becomes the "hero unafraid." He walks through the Valley of the Shadow fearing no evil, as the Captain of Salvation is there by his side.

Bishop Newman, in his "Conversations with Christ," told of daily communion which was to him a light in the darkest hours, an unfailing source o and comfort, a bulwark of strength at all times.

SUPERSTITION KILLS

A GIRL in Kalamazoo read her future in

It is not the only sort of suicide that com

Superstition kills something in all of us. It

Superstition has from the first filled man with and cowardice. It has taken iron out of the b milk of human kindness.

Superstition has covered the seas with terrors filled the forests with fearful things before w mankind has cowered, and exploration and discov

Superstition, like the blackness of night, has hid from man the truths of physical science, of relig of them he has had to grope in doubt and fear.

Superstition caused the world to force the f to crucify the Christ. And just so has it killed ou the human heart much that is good and pure

Superstition has been, through all time, the c

Superstition has made the heart of man a cessp

There are superstitions also that lead to good?

A NEWBORN infant has less likelihood of livin physician, Dr. Richard M. Smith, who has written principles of child hygiene.

"This great war was fought, and won, for the sak of the children—the men and women of tomorrow
It is our duty to the child to assure the best possibl

Patriotism and Religion

XT—Ps. 137 : 5. "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, right hand forget her cunning."

WITH God's ancient people patriotism and religion were inseparable. Their capital city and the temple stood for God in the midst of their beautiful land: "A land ls and valleys, that drinketh water of the rain aven; a land which the Lord thy God careth for the eyes of the Lord thy God are always it, from the beginning of the year even to the of the year." They loved their hills and valleys, vineyards and olive orchards; they loved their le, the chosen people of God, and their kingdom government. Moreover, they knew that their with all its fruitfulness, productiveness and perity was dependent upon their loyalty and fulness to God. I call your attention to this association between religion and patriotism use I profoundly believe that there still subsists union of religion and patriotism in the constitu- and disposition of our American people. Certain that our Colonial forefathers recognized this n of patriotic and religious sentiment and prin- . It is equally certain that no country in the d was ever more implicitly religious than we ericans. With us religion and patriotism go hand n and.

is true that we here in America are in no such case as were these ancient Hebrew captives in ylon. We still have our land intact and are erially prosperous; but we have just emerged of a world war in which we with all the rest of the ld were threatened with a worse captivity than the ylonian inflicted upon the Jewish people. We e escaped the worst results of the war; but we are involved in the widespread wreckage of it and it evolved upon us to take up and settle some serious blems which have resulted from the conflict. st of all, we are being asked to forget and forgive thout a syllable or hint of repentance or sorrow their part) those who have inflicted upon us and the ole world devastations, destructions and unnamed talities, such as no previous page of history of all e records. No tongue or pen will ever be able portray the sufferings and sorrow, the woe and ny that the victims of German atrocity have d inflicted upon them. It is impossible for us to se our eyes and forget these horrors.

The war has left us with a number of complex blems which will tax all our religion and patriot- a, all our steadfast wisdom and righteousness, to et and solve. Toward these problems we must w turn our faces. We are not yet sure that the r is over and that the world's peace is secured. ere are even now about twenty small wars in prog- ss; and we may yet have to gird on our armor and ish the business of securing peace to the world.

I venture to call the present condition of affairs "peace crisis"; and I feel sure that all thoughtful merican people will agree with me in this statement. e have only to turn our eyes and ears to the divided ate of mind in our Congress. If we do not sign the ace treaty we are still at war with Germany and ustria. If we do not agree to and join the League of ations we once more become a nation isolated from e rest of the world and must stand alone on our own efense. Our commercial and industrial conditions e in confusion and must be readjusted to the new nditions which the war has brought about. How all we meet and solve these new peace problems?

We must deepen and strengthen the life of the hurch. How often and how truly has it been said at "the Church is the soul of the nation!" When he war burst upon us, or rather when we were forced break into the war in our own defense as well as r the defense of the liberty and freedom of the world om the unprovoked assault of Germany and her ustrian vassal and ally, it was the Church to which he nation first looked for encouragement and support. he President and other statesmen freely declared hat without the support and co-operation of the hurch we must fail in our defensive endeavors. To his call the Church promptly responded. We recog- ized that the religion and patriotism of the country were inseparable. We gave of our sympathy, our moral support, of our thoughts and thousands and hundreds of thousands of our best young men; we gave of our money without stint to the cry of distress from across the sea, uttered by the starving and perishing millions of non-combatants; we poured out our billions into the national treasury for the necessary expense of the war and in every way linked up our religion with our patriotism.

And now that the war is over and our boys are coming home, what are we to do? Are we to allow them to filter back into the community without extending to them a warm and cordial hand and a "well done, good and faithful soldier"? Will it be enough that we help them to get back their old jobs or better ones? It is our first duty to make our Church so attractive and warm that they will come back with glad and happy hearts. Not attractive with picture shows and amusements, but with a Gospel so loving and fellowship so sincere that they will be compelled. Out in the trenches they came face to face with death and with God. If they find us only formal and indifferent toward them and toward God they will say that we are not real, for they have been used to real things. So many of our boys have come home; and I have been saddened because I have not seen more of them in the congregation and at the place of prayer. If they do not voluntarily return to their place in the house of God, then we must go after them, and after any one of America's noble sons who has served his country and the world on the firing line.

We must develop and strengthen a new and better patriotism. We must supplement our anti-war patriotism with a larger post-war patriotism. In some sense the war awakened us to a new appreciation of what American patriotism meant. A new apprehension of what it meant to be Americans; a new understanding of American ideals. It awakened us out of a slumberous state of mind and heart and called upon us to think of what we stood for and what we owed to ourselves and to the world at large. Sometimes I have thought that God led us into this war just that He might lead us out of ourselves, our pride and selfishness, to a realization of what our true mission in the world was and is. We can never again be the same self-centered, self-contained and self-satisfied people we were before the war. It is not enough that we are proud of our great country; its vast area, its boundless resources, its incomparable opportunities. The war awakened us to a fuller realization of the fact that American ideals were of far greater worth than material greatness and wealth. We can never go back to the old conception of patriotism.

We must one and all become one hundred per cent. Americans. Hitherto, privilege has constituted the larger part of our patriotic dividends. Henceforth we must cut a one hundred per cent. coupon from the life of every American man, woman and child who claims American citizenship, whether he be native born or naturalized. There is no room in this country for a divided allegiance. There can be raised over our land but one flag—"Old Glory." Especially is there no room or place for the red flag of anarchism or nihilism. The war brought to us many blessings as well as entailed upon us some sufferings, sorrows and losses. It has brought its compensations. As never before it has made us a united nation, a consecrated nation, an unselfish and self-sacrificing nation. These are all great assets and should enlarge and enrich our patriotism.

We need and must develop a new preparedness. It was only by a miracle and the peculiar quickness and adaptability of our American spirit that we did not fail and the world did not lose the war to Prussianism. When the determining crisis was upon us we were unprepared for our national duty. And yet, when once America awoke and our political leaders allowed us to hear the summons to arms, by a miracle of Americanism there sprang into being, as it were, almost overnight an army that surprised the world for its bigness, its training, its equipment, its spirit and fighting qualities, that snatched victory out of defeat. We must never again be taken by surprise, unprepared. But our preparedness must be more than military preparedness. We must be prepared intellectually as well as physically.

Every American should make it his business to re-study that immortal Declaration of Indepencence, the charter not only of American liberty, but for the liberty of the whole world. The Constitution of the United States, which Gladstone declared to be the greatest human document ever conceived and written by the brain and the hand of man. How few Americans have read them and fewer still have studied them and laid them up in their hearts. These are our greatest assets, and every American should be versed and familiar with them. It is in our intellectual furniture that we shall find our best preparedness if ever again we are called to war. Every boy and girl in our common schools should know these things as they do the multiplication table or the rudiments of grammar and geography. I would go farther and insist that every alien applying for naturalization should have at least a working knowledge of the Declaration and Constitution.

A restoration of the foundation of our educational system. By this I mean the restoration of the Bible to our school curriculum. I do not mean that I would have any kind of sectarianism taught in our schools, but the spirit of the Bible is essential to the true education of our children. The Bible lies at the foundation of all our institutions. Especially is the Bible the great charter of political as well as religious liberty. More than ever since this war we must put the Bible back into our schools.

The general adjustment of the disputes between labor and capital is not a new problem, but the war and the ending of the war has brought it into greater prominence and perhaps into the very forefront of all our problems. Upon the whole, the workingmen of this country have been loyal and faithful and in some sense long suffering, and we have reason to be proud of our American workingmen. "Sure" they mightily helped us win the war and were not backward in "finishing the job" when it was nearly done. They fought, they labored on the land and sea and they gave their money. If there have been in various places what seem to us to be unwarranted outbreaks of violence in connection with strikes it must be remembered that these unjustifiable outbreaks have been largely promoted by the labors of that class of lawless agitators of whom we have already spoken as "undesirable citizens."

There has been a growing feeling and even conviction among capitalists and great financial and industrial corporations that in the past labor has not had a "square deal" and that in the future there must be a better understanding and closer fellowship between the employer and the employed. That labor is entitled to a fairer and therefore larger proportion of the profits of business and manufacture, without which the wheels of industry could not be turned. No longer must labor and capital be rivals, certainly not enemies, but partners in the very best sense of the word.

We are confronted by an enemy, an economic enemy, in our land as vicious and merciless as ever the Huns were in Belgium and France. I refer to the deliberate exploiting of the people by the corporations and combines that control the distribution and prices of the necessary food and clothing and housing of the people. While it is difficult to bring home the crimes of these good thieves and robbers, there is a deep conviction that we, "the common people," are the victims of a conspiracy to rob us of our necessary food as the Germans were to reduce us to political subserviency and slavery. It does not help us much to have it pointed out that even our own government is hoarding millions of tons of food not now needed by the army in order to save the food purveyors from a bad break in prices.

We look with horror and detestation upon the Bolshevik movement in Russia and its threatened inauguration in our own country and upon the I. W. W. propaganda, the twin of Bolshevism. There is no doubt that these destructive movements originated out of an oppressive economic condition imposed upon the poor people by the oppression of the rich and powerful. Starvation is the mother of Bolshevism. Feed and clothe and properly house the people or make it possible for them to do these things for themselves and they will be contented and happy; starve them and they will rebel and turn anarchists and Bolshevists.

With our fertile land and bumper harvests; our elevators filled to bursting with wheat; our cold storage warehouses crammed with meat, butter and eggs, it is increasingly more and more difficult for the common people to live. The war is over and yet the price of food and clothing and housing is soaring. Why? It becomes us with all our foresight and might to avert this economic tyranny and condition such as that which led to the downfall of Rome and Russia and threatens our own beloved land and people.

There is need for a careful organization of an economic army that shall in some way repel the aggression of this enemy within our own borders as cruel and merciless in its purposes and practices as were the prosecutors of the undersea assassinations that murdered the Lusitania victims and put 2,000,000 Armenians to starvation.

God and a steadfast purpose to do the right as He shall give us to see the right can only steer us clearly between the shoals and rocks that surround our ship of state and our economic and social interests.

Grow "Younger"

Younger in Body, Younger in Spirit, Younger in Ambition, Younger in Every Characteristic that Gives Greater Earning and Living Power, Greater Thought Power, Greater Pleasure Obtaining Power and Greater Health Promoting Power

THE number of years a man has lived does not tell how old or young he is. A man is as old as or young as his energy, his vitality, his capacity for work and play, his resisting power against disease and fatigue. A man is only as old or as young as his memory power, will power, sustained-thought power, personality power, concentration power and brain power. He is only as old or as young as his digestive power, his heart power, his lung power, his kidney power, his liver power. Age is measured by the age of our cells, tissues and organs, and not by the calendar!

Cultivate the Cells

Everybody knows that the body and brain are made up of millions of tiny cells. We can be no younger than those cells are young. We can be no more efficient in any way than those cells are efficient. We can be no more energetic than the combined energy of those cells.

By conscious cultivation of these cells, it is as natural as the law of gravity that we become more efficient, more alive, more energetic, more ambitious, more enthusi tic, more youthful. By consciously developing the ce in our stomachs we must improve our digestion. consciously developing the cells in the heart we mu increase its strength in exact proportion. By consciou developing the brain cells the result can only be mult plied brain power—and so with every organ in the bod

What we are and what we are capable of accomplishing depen entirely and absolutely on the degree of development of o cells. They are the sole controlling factors in us. We are on as young and as great and as powerful as they are.

There Is No Fraud Like Self-Deceptio

You may think you are young, strong, brainy, energeti happy, yet when compared with other men or women, you a old, weak, dull, listless and unhappy. You do not know wh you are capable of accomplishing because you have not begu to develop the real vital powers within you. The truth you are only a dwarf in health and mind when you can easi become a giant through conscious development of every ce tissue and organ in your body and brain.

By accelerating the development of the powers within yo you can actually become younger, as you grow older—yes, younger every way that will contribute to your health, happiness and prosperit

Conscious Evolution—the Secret

Swoboda proves that Conscious Evolution gives energy and vitality spare, digestive power to spare, self-reliance to spare, and gives man other desirable characteristics to spare. He proves that Conscious Ev lution makes people disease-proof, fatigue-proof. He maintains that possess sufficient vitality and energy and to keep the body in norm health under the most favorable conditions is no more health prosperit than to have only enough money from day to day to meet current penses. Great reserve health, great reserve energy are what we mus acquire if we are to successfully null fy the ravages of time, and to easil overcome every adverse condition and thus enjoy the benefit of our sources, the benefit of our health power and the advantage of our energy

Beware of Health Poverty

As Swoboda says, "there are individuals who seek work only when thei last cent is gone." Likewise, individuals live from minute to minute an from day to day, seeking health and energy only as they need them badly Conscious Evolution is for them—for everyone. It is a simple, scienti and practical system by means of which every part of the brain and bod is energized, strengthened, awakened, so that we become possessors of super health and mentality—the Swoboda kind of health and mentality Conscious Evolution makes for good fortune by developing the resour and the ability and power of personality.

Strange as it may seem, this revolutionary method of consciously awak-ening and developing weakened and lifeless cells requires no drugs medicines or apparatus of any kind. It does not require dieting, deep breathing, excessive exercising, cold baths, electricity or massage. It takes only a few minutes a day, yet so startling is the effect of Swoboda's system that you begin to feel younger, renewed, vitalized, re-energized after the very first day.

Conscious Evolution

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with Darwinian evolution, nor should Conscious Evolution be confused with Hindoo philosophies, auto-suggestion, self-hypnosis, gymnastics, or mere physiology, anatomy, histology, theosophy, morphology, medicine, pathology, exercise, New Thought, Christian Science, calesthenics, embryology or psychology.

Conscious Evolution is not an occult science, nor a metaphysical science, nor a divine science, nor a spiritual science, nor a material science, nor is Conscious Evolution a symbolical science, nor a hoping, wishing, longing and dreaming philosophy.

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with any of the conceptually symbolic systems of the secondary and tertiary type, and Conscious Evolution cannot be comprehended in any of the present day concepts in science and philosophy, including the science of biology.

Conscious Evolution must not be confused with any present day philosophies or sciences of a material or mental character.

Conscious Evolution cannot be understood by physicians, psychologists, physical culturists, philosophers, chemists, cosmologists or biologists of the present day.

Conscious Evolution is a new and original science, an exact science, a demonstrable science—a science of the evolution of and through Conscious Energy—a science of the Ultimate.

Conscious Evolution is the beginning of a new evolutionary era for the human race.

Conscious Evolution is the way and means to arouse, inspire, lead, advance and raise humanity to a higher level—mentally, physically, physiologically, psychologically, evolutionarily and creatively.

The aim of Conscious Evolution is to give the highest freedom from failure, misery, sin weakness and evolutionary bankruptcy, and to give the highest liberty to enjoy the full life, the better life, the higher life, the persistent life—the eternal life.

The aim of Conscious Evolution is to ascertain all of the truths of the universe—all of the principles, all of the laws and all of the elements and factors of existence—and to so employ them as to gain the greatest intensity or volume of the greatest good, as will harmonize with the Ultimate.

Conscious Evolution aims to establish conceptual law and order, through a higher consciousness of the principles of all phenomena. It aims to establish a concrete and definite and invariable realization of truth as it is.

Conscious Evolution aims to increase the power of each individual to adopt truth for self and to adopt self to truth.

Conscious Evolution overcomes weakness through power, feebleness through energy, fear through courage, nervousness through self-reliance, illness through health, misery through happiness, delusion through truth, failure through success by higher personal evolution through the creative power of the internal creator of the mind and body. Conscious Evolution requires no faith, for it uses a specific agent or avenue or means for the definite purpose of reaching the creative forces of each individual, and evolutionarily activating them, thus creating a rise in personal creation, through the process of evolution of the individual.

Conscious Evolution is based on the discovery of the origin, nature and laws of the LIFE PRINCIPLE. It is based on the new and demonstrable conception of the LIFE "SUBSTANTIA."

The aim of Conscious Evolution is to enable individuals personally to rise to the highest planes of existence, through action governed by a realization of principles and laws of demonstrable and ultimate truth.

The aim of Conscious Evolution is to raise humanity to the highest possible plane in mind health, civilization, laws, justice, science, philosophy, evolution, creation, destiny and the Ultimate.

ou Grow Older

What Others Have to Say:

“onscious Evolution has done all for me that you promised and I am radiating good health. I can hardly believe it myself, it has made a great change in me. I am in better condition than I have been enty years and am chock full of energy and ambition. Tasks that a burden to me in the past are now easy and a pleasure. I have oney to burn or throw to the birds, but if you were to offer me one and dollars in good hard cash and put me back where I was before ning your system, I would say, ‘Nothing doing.’ I enjoy the work ave mapped out for me and am impatient to get at it.”

SHALL BE SIXTY-SIX YEARS OLD NEXT AUGUST, f you were to see me right now you would say ‘Forty,’ and, fact, I am better, stronger, and have more energy than the ge man at forty. I have only you and your system to thank hese things, and I want to thank you from the very bottom rateful heart for what you have done for me. I am a man in every sense of the word, whereas I was only a fraction of an and rather a small fraction before profiting through scious Evolution.”

he strangest part of it all is that my hearing is greatly improved. muscles of my shoulders, back and abdomen are immense, and I have tten that I have a liver, kidneys, heart, or any other organs, except tomach which makes a loud call three times a day. I have lost all e for stimulants.”

“I AM SEVENTY-ONE YEARS OF AGE, and in three weeks your system has apparently made a new man of me. I am so enthusiastic over Conscious Evolution that it is difficult for me to control myself, and not do more than you say. I want to thank you for the interest you are taking in my case. When I wrote you for your instructions I was in a very desperate condition. I have never been sorry for one minute that I have written you. On the contrary, I want to thank you for what you are doing for me. I am getting along fine; I am a wonder to myself. It does not seem possible that there could be such a change in any one in such a short time.”

“When I tell some of my friends how quickly I was benefited by Conscious Evolution, they do not believe me. They think I exaggerate.”

“One year ago I was an old man at forty; today I am a youth at forty-one.”

“I must state that the principle of your system is the most scientific and at the same time the simplest, I have ever heard. You do not misrepresent one single word in your advertising.”

“My reserve force makes me feel that nothing is impossible, my capacity both physically and mentally is increasing daily.”

“I am very thankful that the Lord directed me to Conscious Evolution through the Christian Herald.”

The Wealth Which Is Not Money

SUNDAY. Rev. 3 : 17. "Thou sayest, I am rich, and knowest not that thou art poor." The real measure of our wealth is how much we should be worth if we lost our money. Money is apt to hide or obscure other values. There is a glare about it which throws them to the shade, and it is only as this confusing limelight is removed that the real and vital worth is revealed. We speak of a man having died "worth so much." That is the banker's measure, but when the banker has finished his reckoning, what is there left? When the banker has gone the real test remains. What is the man worth? The personalty was valued at so much: now for the personality. How much is it worth? "He left $100,000." Yes, but what and how much did he take with him?

And thus we are beset by a sleepless enticement to regard personal possessions as more precious than personal worth. We are tempted to be keenly alert about things and numb or indifferent to the dispositions and acquisitions of the soul. It was this lure which presented itself to our Lord. The tempter came to him and sought to turn his gaze away from the supreme value to things of infinitely inferior worth. "All these things will I give thee if thou wilt fall down and worship me." "Things . . . thou!" That is the illicit and degrading barter. The tempter offers us things in exchange for the soul. He would degrade our personality by giving us toys to play with, leaving them in our hands in very precarious tenure. And that is the temptation which is being whispered and shouted on every side in our own day. "Things" for "thee." Let self "fall down" and the tempter promises to pile up our possessions. "All these things will I give thee." Who does not hear the enticement which is spoken in a hundred different ways? There seem to be many voices, but the sounds are ventriloqual and the speaker is one. He would confuse our minds and hearts by luring us into the delusion that things are the supreme worth of our life.

The New Testament brings out quite other measures and reveals incomparably more glorious worth. To turn from the gaudy glaring treasures of the earth to the riches of the New Testament is like passing from the paint, and artifice, and dead devices of the stage into the light of nature, and the sweetness of green pastures and the fragrance of the blowing corn.

And this is our true wealth, and this wealth remains even when our money suddenly finds wings and flies away. The apostle Paul lost all his things. "For whom I have suffered the loss of all things!" What had he left? "All things." "Having nothing, yet possessing all things." He was more than a millionaire in the inheritance of the glory which fadeth not away.

The Peaceful Life

MONDAY. John 14 : 27. "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you." The greatest miracle in the life of Jesus Christ is the fact that though he was most bitterly hated, most relentlessly persecuted, he was most at peace. He was never anxious, never disturbed, never perturbed by any mere event. It is true he wept at the grave of Lazarus. It is true he sighed when he was about to confer the gift of speech upon a dumb man. It is true he was angry when he saw how his Father's house had been turned into a den of thieves. It is true that in Gethsemane for a passing moment he was heavy-hearted. Nevertheless, he was not at any time fearful or doubtful or disturbed. In the great crises of his life he was calm as the stars, unshaken as the sun. He knew the meaning of "inward peace subsisting at the heart of endless agitation." The Master's peace was a gift. What was its nature? Do the Scriptures give us any knowledge on this point? Is it not clear that it was the peace of perfect love? "Great peace have they that love thy law." It was also the peace of satisfying knowledge. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God." It was the peace of an eternal and infinite alliance, the peace of the consciousness of a power not of earth, a power superior to earth.

The Old Paths

TUESDAY. Jer. 6 : 16. "Ask for the old paths, where is the good way." If I were asked to furnish a first glimpse of those few scattered Christians of the first Church, I would reply that they were simple folk. Unencumbered by machinery and traditions and caste and ritual, they moved freely over the whole realm of opportunity. Stephen and Philip might be appointed to serve tables while Peter and John preached; but if Stephen and Philip preached as helpfully as Peter and John, they were invited to do so. No Church can grow, no country can develop, unless there be this freedom of opportunity, this simple aim, this one thing for you and me to do. The early Christians knew what the one thing was, they did it simply and faithfully, and they changed the viewpoint of the world.

These are days when every institution seeks to justify its usefulness by propaganda. The one catholic and worldwide Church of Christ has grown directly from the little societies of early Christians. As they drew inspiration from their Bible, so shall we draw inspiration from ours. As they brought ancient wisdom to bear on modern problems, so shall we follow their example. What we read of old times bears on what we do in the Twentieth Century. Our schools and colleges tell us that we learn much by fighting over again the battles of Greece and Rome. These Christians fought the biggest battle of all, and it continues unto this day.

Petrified Trees

WEDNESDAY. Rev. 2 : 4. "Nevertheless, I have this against thee, because thou hast left thy first love." The church at Ephesus had lost its love power since Paul and John had been her pastors. It may be that some churches today are feasting upon the apples of prosperity while not caring for the garden of the Lord. It is said that the Apostolic Church had power rather than influence, while we have more influence than power. Peter had neither silver nor gold, but he had the divine power of healing for the cripple. It may be that pure and undefiled religion has been adulterated with worldliness and ease. Some have chosen Barabbas instead of Christ, evolution instead of revelation. The tree of life in the garden of the Church has become like the petrified agate trees of Arizona, beautiful to look upon, but with no fruitage and no life coursing through their veins. Some churches are polished relics of former greatness, soulless petrifactions, magnificence in ruins. Wealth may adorn, culture and refinement may polish, but the spiritual avenues are closed to the inflowing of divine love. How are the mighty fallen! Changed into stone, gleaming in galvanized splendor!

Only repentance and rebaptism will restore such to the first love of Christ. God's ocean tides are ready to fill when we are ready to receive. The church is not only to make good men better but to make bad men good, not only to care for the ninety and nine, but search for the wandering one. She should add daily such as are being saved to her membership. Saving others is a true indication of our own salvation. Electricity applied will make the muscles of dead animals appear alive; so fine oratory, elegant essays, beautiful rhetoric, personal magnetism may galvanize spiritually lifeless congregations so they will look like life, but they must be quickened with divine energy if they are to be numbered among the people of the living God. How glorious to know that our youth may be renewed like the eagle's; our life saved from destruction, crowned forever with the Father's loving kindness and tender mercies! Our guilty conscience may be cleansed, made as peaceful as the bosom of Christ, stainless as angels' robes. Without Christ, sin will find you out; with Him, never!

Precious Ointment and Baskets

THURSDAY. Mark 14 : 8. "She hath done what she could." It was a nameless woman who annointed the feet of Jesus with precious ointment; but her sufficient reward was in his words, "She hath wrought a good work on me." It was a nameless publican who made the prayer, "God be merci- to me a sinner;" but his immortality is in the commendation, "He went down to his house justified." It was a nameless Samaritan who ministered to the wounded traveler on the Jericho road; but what greater praise could he desire than this: "Go thou and do likewise."

Not long ago the newspapers made mention of a young man who had been honored by our civil authorities for saving the life of a drowning woman. But let us have the whole story. His mother was a Christian woman who had been left a widow with two sons. One of them shared his mother's religion and with Christian devotion wove baskets to support her. The other spent his days with boon companions at the wharves, and on hearing a woman's cry for help he plunged in and saved her. Which of these twain, think you, was the real hero—the son with the medal or the crippled wage-earner in the humble home?

Let this hearten those who, with high purposes and aspirations, are hampered by the close conditions of humble life. A name in the newspapers is of little moment to such as have reason to believe that their names are written on their Saviour's hands. The supreme reward of Christian fidelity awaits us at heaven's gate. "Well done, good and faithful servant! Enter thou into the joys of thy Lord!" What are the trumpetings of fame to a welcome like that? So, with our weakness resolved into strength and all handicaps removed, we shall at last receive our promotion to higher tasks.

The Church That Succeeds

FRIDAY. Joshua 1 : 8. "Thou s have good success." The Chu of Christ has as much right to l forward to spiritual success as business has to expect commercial s cess. God promises his people succ if they will but fulfil the conditi which make for it. The Church Christ is facing the greatest oppor nities of its history, and in this new the Church that succeeds must be

First, a Church which preaches truths of the Gospel. We do not nee new Gospel, but we need the old Gos anew—the Gospel in which the fun mental truths are emphasized and m once again are told that Christ came save them; that through the sheddi of his blood they can have remissi of sin, and that above us is a God w loves and cares for all.

Second, the Church that succee must live the truths that it believ The truths preached from our pulpi must be lived by the people in t pews. Truth must be put into actio What the truth needs today is life a an opportunity to express itself in deed Third, the Church that succeeds mu have a humanitarian love for the peopl When Christ was here he fed the mu titudes and cared for the people. Th work which he did he left the Churc to carry on. Human interests mu come before material interests. Th people of God must have a saving lov for the people that are lost.

Fourth, the Church that succee must be a soul-winning Church. Th great thing after all for which Christ lef his Church in the world was to save It is not only true that the individua who wins souls is wise, but the Churc which wins souls is wise. The Churc must reproduce itself; and the only wa it can do this is through the new live which are born again into the Kingdom of God.

Camouflaging the Soul

SATURDAY. Rom. 7 : 24. "O wretched man that I am! who shal deliver me from the body of this death?" Sin is like a dead body, ever dragging the soul down. It is an ever present evil dwelling within and without the manhood. Paul's way of freedom from the monster was through Jesus Christ the Lord, "who hath made us free from the law of sin and death." Hell is where sin is; heaven is where love is. Sin must appear to be sin before it is removed. The soul must cry out, "Against thee, and thee only, have I sinned." Sin is wilful disobedience to God and his laws. To eat the forbidden fruit and excuse your fall by saying, "Evil, be thou my good," is to presume against the Almighty. Mercy is often hoped for as one plunges deeper into sin. How terrible to make the goodness of God a reason for continuance in evil ways! Some say, "I can be forgiven on a dying bed, and thus secure the pleasures of both earth and heaven;" but such presumptions only sink one into deeper perdition. Such hopes are vain.

Riches, honors, pleasures camouflage the soul's real condition. It is equivalent to saying, "I have much goods, lofty honors, great influence; soul, take thine ease, be merry. All is well that ends well. I can make my peace with God at last. He is love and mercy." But at the last, sin hardens the heart till it is past feeling, and the Holy Spirit of God, ceasing its strivings, takes its everlasting flight.

HOME WITH A CAPITAL "H"

By
CHARLES M. SHELDON

THERE was never a time when the word Home should be spelled with as big a capital as now. Home means more to hearts of men and women the d over than ever before, for never re have the homes of the whole d been so torn with grief.

ow our boys have come back men, t they before took for granted in way of comforts and protection now appreciate and thank God For have they not been for the homeless?

ox-cars and haymows their sleeping ns; the wooden bench their easy ir; the mess kit their china and er.

ome so far away! How dear it v as the days went by! How they h they had been more helpful! at a forlorn world without a Home dream of!

ome, Mother, Dad! Now they ow the admonitions and warnings Mother and Dad were all right, for they not seen many a fine fellow in the face of temptation while they had remem- ed and had come back clean, with a glad heart, the old Home?

Mother and Dad have learned things, too, as they ve kept the Home fires burning; with their hearts oss the sea they have made a big fight to grow ger and broader in thought and sympathy for uth with all its problems, hopes and ambitions; ying that they might not be found wanting or nar- v by the boy in khaki as he returns to them.

OMETHING happened in my home the other day that has made me think hard. I am going to tell u about it. My faithful cook had gone on a vaca- n, and shortly after she left a member of the nily became seriously ill. I had two nurses to cook besides the many telephone and door-bell calls answer.

So when a young friend, a girl of nineteen, begged let her come for a few days to help me I thought it uld be lovely to have her with me. This girl, who ways looked so dainty and attractive, I was sure uld be a comfort, as I had no daughter of my own.

At all times, but especially at a time like this, I had en careful to keep things clean and in order; when my little friend asked to make biscuit r supper she went into a white enameled tchen, clean and sweet. When she came out, e little hard biscuits baked, disorder and our reigned everywhere. Shelves, stove and or were as if a whirlwind had struck them. was really embarrassed, but she did not seem notice it at all, seemingly thinking that was e only way it could be done. So I cleaned p my kitchen and said nothing.

Each day following a surprise came to me in hat I called thoughtlessness. When she used he electric iron to press her dainty blouse he iron and board were always left for me to ut away. When she took books from the ookcases the doors were never closed, and the ooks were left anywhere in the house or on the orch after they had been read. The dainty edroom I gave her—well, after the second ay I did not want to look into it.

And yet she is a lovely girl, but one who has ot learned that disorder and restfulness are ot found in the same house, that poise and uietness are hard to find in confusion.

This is why I am thinking and wondering if ur daughters are going to measure up to our ons who have come from the hard school 'Over There," or if they, too, should stand "at ttention" for a while.

Homes a National Asset

By EDWARD N. HURLEY, Chairman U. S. Shipping Board

TO MY mind nothing is so important to the future of our country as the question of homes for our people. One of the reasons the French were so courageous and fought so hard was to protect their homes. There are 8,000,000 persons who own their own homes in France, and I am certain there will be very little Bolshevism in that great country, for this reason. Employers should encourage their employees to own their homes. A man who owns his own home is a better citizen, his family is better provided for, and he is a better workman when he carries on his shoulders the responsibility of a home.

In my companies we have for years urged men to buy their homes, and we are now arranging to help finance them through outside sources, we assuming a certain responsibility. The Own-Your-Own-Home movement is a great patriotic movement that should enthuse and encourage every one to buy a home. Some standard method of purchasing a home should be worked out whereby the purchaser could pay a small amount down and carry the balance at a reasonable rate of interest with a certain percentage of the value of the house charged off annually for depreciation. Insurance premiums should also be figured in, and the story told in a simple way, so that the owner would appreciate that an investment of this kind would be the best he could make.

There is a feeling on the part of many men that it is cheaper to rent a home than to purchase one. This should be figured out so as to prove to them that it is not so, by citing the example of a $4,000 home on which $500 is paid down and the balance paid in seven years at the rate of $500 a year. Allowing 5 per cent. for depreciation, at the end of seven years the house would represent a negotiable investment of $2,600. Most men would find it difficult to save this sum in twice the time in any other wav.

The Home in China

WHEN asked in the winter time if he is cold, the Chinese man replies as a matter of fact, "Of course."

He is always cold. His very blood is congealed, because he knows nothing of artificial heat. When out of doors he is usually indoors under the canopied streets, and when in the house he might just as well be outside as far as warmth and privacy are concerned.

On the streets canopies are arranged to keep off the sun and rain and in the house big windows without any glass and often without even the thin paper used as panes, let in all the cold winds.

The Chinese haven't yet adopted the Western method of piling one story on top of the other, but spread their houses all over the ground. A man builds as many rooms as he can afford and brings a garden or two within his abode.

"How do they manage to keep even a little bit warm?" some one wants to know.

"By wearing layers and layers of wadded clothing," is the answer. Father and mother and all the family regulate the number of layers by the temperature. The rich families wear silken kimonos lined with fur and the poor ones many thicknesses of cotton goods. Nobody wears any underclothes or night wear. They wrap themselves in quilts at night and lie down to some sort of dreams.

The stranger who meets a man in the winter often fails to recognize in the slim person he sees in the spring the very fat man he remembers. This bulky form of dressing is hardest on the little children. Often they are so padded that if they happen to lose their balance and fall down they have to stay there until some one comes along and stands them on their feet again.

The houses in China are not numbered, but huge lanterns painted scarlet and made of strips of bamboo and oiled paper hang on either side of the entrance with the resident's name on them in black characters. Some of these lanterns are so huge that the fat man of the circus would have plenty of room inside once he squeezed through the opening.

There are no fireplaces or stoves in the houses and consequently no chimneys, although by degrees a few chimneys are throwing their silhouettes against the sky as Western manufactories, electric light plants, and water-works are finding their way into China.

Brass foot-warmers and hand-warmers are used by some of the Chinese. A live cake or two of charcoal is put in with the ashes and thus heat is conserved for a couple of hours. People frequently carry around portable furnaces containing embers and coal. Every little while they pause in their work or play to warm themselves. These crude methods of getting warm are "life savers" to the poor women with their "lily feet," who on account of their helplessness are unable to get any exercise.

A "k'ang" or "brick bed" made of adobe bricks is the family bed. The whole family huddle on this one warm spot to sleep. A fire is made under this brick platform and one is apt to wake up freezing when the fire dies out, or come very near being roasted alive.

In certain parts of China where the missionaries have penetrated the people are beginning to know what it means to be more comfortable in the cold weather.

No traveler to China ever quite makes up his mind which is the filthiest place in the republic. After visiting the northern part he is convinced that nothing could possibly be worse until he gets to south China; then he changes his mind.

The Chinese have absolutely no idea of the first rules of sanitation.

A Hint for Fastening Corners

IN HEMMING towels or napkins much time is saved if, instead of tying the ends of the threads—eight of which will be left on each towel—the foot of the machine is raised, the hem turned on the needle while it is in the last stitch at the end of the hem, the foot lowered and ten or twelve stitches taken through the first stitching of the hem. The thread may then be cut off short, or close to the stitch. Such a fastening is much stronger than the old way, and is by far more quickly and easily done; the old way requiring eight or ten motions on each corner to tie and cut the threads, while the above requires but four or five. Here we are practicing the new efficiency; in other words, economy of motion.

THE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEE

Brooklyn Transit Strike

RIOTING and widespread disorder accompanied a strike of the employees of all the Brooklyn transit lines which began on August 6. Subways, elevated railways and surface lines were involved, and there was almost complete suspension of service not only in Brooklyn but between Brooklyn and Manhattan. Some 5,000,000 passengers a day are carried normally on the lines involved, all of which for several months have been operated by Lindley M. Garrison, formerly Secretary of War and now receiver for the United States courts. In point of importance of territory served, the vast interests involved and the determination of both sides to see the fight carried through to a finish, the strike was probably the largest and most significant of the country's street railway disturbances. The principal demand of the employees was recognition of their union. A twenty per cent. increase in wages, they declared, was incidental. The receiver, actively supported by United States Judge Julius M. Mayer, flatly refused to deal with the union, but a compromise was reached and the men returned to work on the 10th.

Threats of a strike on all New York City's transit systems and of the New York police, failed to materialize. The latter are being unionized.

Eastern Europe in a Turmoil

ARCHDUKE JOSEPH, nephew of the old Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria-Hungary, took over the government of Hungary on August 6 while the Rumanian army occupied the capital. The Rumanians, coming westward from the River Theiss against the positive commands of the Peace Conference, entered Budapest on August 4, completed their occupation the day following, and served on the de facto government an ultimatum requiring an agreement by the same evening to surrender to Rumania virtually all the transportation facilities, farm and factory machinery and food left in the country.

The developments in the East were so sudden that the Peace Conference had little opportunity to do more than protest before Budapest had been seized. Mandates had been sent to the Rumanian government ordering it to bring its invasion of Hungary to an end, and to observe the conditions of the armistice, but these were disregarded. When the news of the ultimatum reached Paris, Nicholas Misu, of the Rumanian peace delegation, was called before the Supreme Council and received a communication for his government declaring the ultimatum would not be recognized.

As a next step, Herbert C. Hoover, head of the Inter-Allied Relief Commission, sent a message to Bucharest that no more foodstuffs would go either to Rumania or Hungary until Rumania agreed to abide by the edicts of the Conference. An embargo on shipments to Hungary was necessary, he said, because the Rumanian forces were seizing all the food intended for consumption by the Hungarians. Later he left Paris for the Near East.

The Peace Conference on the 10th made public a note to Roumania which indicated a complete break by the latter from the allied powers.

Japan's Shantung Announcement

VISCOUNT UCHIDA, Japanese Foreign Minister, issued his expected statement on Japan's intentions with regard to Shantung on August 5. Japan, he said, does not intend to claim rights in the province which would impair Chinese sovereignity and he promised a withdrawal of Japanese troops as soon as "an agreement is concluded with China." The statement was in line with other Japanese announcements in Tokio, Washington and Paris, and seemed to have disappointed President Wilson, who had been anxiously awaiting it, for he followed it the following day with a statement from the White House. The agreement with China, referred to by Viscount Uchida, has reference to the treaty of 1915 with its supplementary understanding of 1918. The President says this may be misleading to Americans, and declares unequivocally that in the exchange of opinions in Paris which led to the agreement on the Shantung settlement as incorporated in the peace treaty, "I felt it my duty to say that nothing that I agree to must be construed as an acquiescence on the part of the government of the United States in the policy of the notes exchanged between China and Japan in 1915 and 1918."

Secretary Lansing Testifies

ROBERT LANSING, Secretary of State, was before the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs answering inquiries on the developments in the Peace Conference. He was asked if the Shantung award was necessary to obtain Japan's signature to the League of Nations Covenant.

"I don't know," replied Mr. Lansing.

"Do you think Japan would have signed it without Shantung?" he was asked.

"I think she would have signed."

"Then why did you yield?"

"We were subject to the decision of the President of the United States," answered the Secretary.

"Then it was his decision?"

"Necessarily."

"What reasons did the President give for it?"

"He gave no reasons."

Discussing the famous "fourteen points," Mr. Lansing said they had been followed "as far as we could follow them."

Senator Johnson asked if the Shantung decision came under the principle of self-determination.

"No, sir," was Mr. Lansing's reply.

"Am I correct in saying it violates the principles of self-determination?" the Senator asked.

"Yes," said Mr. Lansing.

Consideration of the peace treaty in the Senate was virtually shelved during the week ending August 11, while some effort was made to solve the question of the high cost of living and meet the railroad employees' demands.

CHARACTER IN THE HAYNES CREATES VALUE IN YOUR INVESTMENT

THE new 1920 Haynes has the four factors of character which are essential to the full realization of the value a car should give its owner. Well-rounded character is impossible in a car if one of these factors is missing. Haynes engineers and designers, with the exact training resting upon the twenty-six years of Haynes success, combine these four factors of car-character with the expertness of the mechanical engineer and the artistry of the professional body-builder and finisher.

BEAUTY—STRENGTH—POWER—COMFORT —these are the four factors of character which combine to place the new 1920 Haynes in its superior class. The dependable, velvety power of the Haynes engine, the sturdy strength of the Haynes chassis, the easy comfort of the roomy seats—all these are augmented by the classic beauty of the car itself.

The new 1920 Haynes is sold at a price you can afford to pay, at a price which is economically consistent with the genuine worth of the car.

Deliveries are being made as rapidly as possible, but we ask you to bear in mind the fact that no Haynes car leaves our plant until it has the full approval of the responsible heads of departments whose duty it is to certify that the car in every respect is up to Haynes standards. If you have no Haynes dealer near you, write us and we will advise you where to buy your new Haynes.

President's High Cost Remedies

PRESIDENT WILSON, after several days' consultation with his cabinet and a special government committee, has evolved the Administration program for combating mounting prices in foodstuffs and other necessaries.

The President's remedies for the existing distressful conditions of living were:

1. The passage of the Peace Treaty.
2. The sale of surplus stocks of both food and clothing in the hands of the Government.
3. The drawing out of storage and putting upon the market certain stocks in private hands.
4. The extension of the present Food Control act, both as to the period of time during which it is to remain in operation, and as to the commodities to which it shall apply.
5. The passage of a statute providing a penalty for profiteering.
6. The passage of a law regulating cold storage as it is regulated by the laws of the State of New Jersey, which limits the time during which goods may be kept in storage, prescribes the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the permitted period, and requires that the goods released from storage shall bear the date of their receipt.
7. Passage of a law providing that all goods released from storage for interstate shipment should have plainly marked on each package the selling or market price at which they went into storage.
8. Provision of law providing that all goods destined for interstate commerce should, in every case, where package makes it possible, be marked with the price at which they left the hands of the purchaser.
9. Formulation of a law requiring a Federal license of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and embodying in the license or in the conditions under which it is to be issued specific regulations designed to secure competitive selling and prevent unconscionable profit in the method of market.
10. Passage of the bill now pending before Congress, proposed by the Capital Issues Committee, for the control of security issues.

THE President's address before a joint session of Congress met with repeated and enthusiastic applause. The more notable of his phrases follow:

"We must face the fact that unless we help Europe to get back to her normal life and production, a chaos will ensue there which will inevitably be communicated to this country.

"For the present, it is manifest, we must quicken, not slacken, our own production. We, and we almost alone, now hold the world steady. Upon our steadfastness and self-possession depend the affairs of nations everywhere. It is in this supreme crisis—this crisis for all mankind—that America must prove her mettle. In the presence of a world confused, distracted, she must show herself self-possessed, self-contained, capable of sober and effective action. She saved Europe by her action in arms; she must now save it by her action in peace. In saving Europe she will save herself, as she did upon the battlefields of the war. The calmness and capacity with which she deals with and masters the problems of peace will be the final test and proof of her place among the peoples of the world.

"And, if only in our own interest, we must help the people overseas. Europe is our biggest customer. We must keep her going, or thousands of our shops and scores of our mines must close. There is no such thing as letting her go to ruin without ourselves sharing in the disaster.

"In such circumstances, face to face with such tests, passion must be discarded. Passion and a disregard for the rights of others have no place in the counsels of a free people.

"We need light, not heat, in these solemn times of self-examination and saving action. There must be no threats. Let there be only intelligent counsel, and let the best reasons win, not the strongest brute force. The world has just destroyed the arbitrary force of a military 'junta.' It will live under no other. All that is arbitrary and coercive is in the discard. Those who seek to employ it only prepare their own destruction.

"We cannot hastily and overnight revolutionize all the processes of our economic life. We shall not attempt to do so.

"These are days of deep excitement and of extravagant speech; but with us these are things of the surface. Every one who is in real touch with the silent masses of our great people knows that the old strong fiber and steady self-control are still there, firm against violence or any distempered action that would throw their affairs into confusion.

"I am serenely confident that they will readily find themselves, no matter what the circumstances, and that they will address themselves to the tasks of peace with the same devotion and the same stalwart preference for what is right that they displayed to the admiration of the whole world in the midst of war.

"And I entertain another confident hope. I have spoken today chiefly of measures of imperative regulation and legal compulsion, of prosecutions and the sharp correction of selfish processes; and these, no doubt, are necessary. But there are other forces that we may count on besides those resident in the Department of Justice.

"We have just fully awakened to what has been going on and to the influences, many of them very selfish and sinister, that have been producing high prices and imposing an intolerable burden on the mass of our people.

"To have brought it all into the open will accomplish the greater part of the result we seek. I appeal with entire confidence to our producers, our middlemen, and our merchants, to deal fairly with the people. It is their opportunity to show that they comprehend, that they intend to act justly, and that they have the public interest sincerely at heart.

"And I have no doubt that housekeepers all over the country and every one who buys the things he daily stands in need of will presently exercise a greater vigilance, a more thoughtful economy, a more discriminating care as to the market in which he buys or the merchant with whom he trades than he has hitherto exercised.

"I believe, too, that the more extreme leaders of organized labor will presently yield to a sober second thought and, like the great mass of their associates, think and act like true Americans. They will see that strikes undertaken at this critical time are certain to make matters worse, not better—worse for them and for everybody else.

"The worst thing, the most fatal thing that can be done now is to stop or interrupt production or to interfere with the distribution of goods by the railways, and the shipping of the country.

"We are all involved in the distressing results of the high cost of living, and we must unite, not divide, to correct it. There are many things that ought to be corrected in the relations between capital and labor, in respect of wages and conditions of labor and other things even more far-reaching, and I for one, am ready to go into conference about these matters with any group of my fellow countrymen who know what they are talking about and are willing to remedy existing conditions by frank counsel rather than by violent contest.

"No remedy is possible while men are in a temper, and there can be no settlement which does not have as its motive and standard the general interest.

"Threats and undue insistence upon the interest of a single class make settlement impossible. I believe as I have hitherto had occasion to say to the Congress, that the industry and life of our people and of the world will suffer irreparable damage if employers and workmen are to go on in a perpetual contest, as antagonists. They must, on one plan or another, be effecti sociated.

"Have we not steadiness an possession and business sense en

we have, and we shall work it

n Isolated Mission Station

ITO, in Spanish Guinea, West frica, has been shut off from direct unication with the Cameroon sta- by order of the government, since ccupation of Cameroon by the h in January, 1916. It has been to get supplies for the medical and work, but Dr. Smith, the physi- at the station, has not relaxed his s. He writes:

here is no shortage of work, but re getting on well. Of course, age in drugs and surgical supplies hindered us, but in spite of it I had cases last month, 12 operations 30 patients in at the close of the h. I have many white patients They come to me. I do not go ; often from ships and up and down oast. People come from so far— arthest case has come from Brazer- away up the Congo River, some miles from here. This one came n operation, and it is pretty bad in a to be sick, but worse to go a long and find the doctor not at home.

My family (Dr. Smith is a bachelor) uite well and very interesting. My addition is a baby chimpanzee—so funny, yet so interesting; almost human. It was a present from a Spanish trader. My pet python did a bit more police work today. A big Fang man came in for treatment. I asked him if he was a Christian. He said: "No, my heart never told me to 'God palaver' yet, and I no go till my heart talk." I told him: "All right, I no make you medicine now; my heart no talk yet, you wait till my heart tell me." He begged, but I refused, so he got vexed and started out of the house, but he could not open the door. I took out the snake, and the man ran around the table, the snake reaching out his head, and the Fang yelling. After a few circles he fell on his knees, held up his hands, and begged for mercy. I said: "Oh, no, my heart no tell me to stop yet." Then he told the truth when he said: "Oh, massa, I be one big fool. No hurt me. I will go" (meaning to church).

"Well, it is a bit of fun my family make for me, and they do make an awful impression on the natives. They might not respect a white man, but they take off their hats to the python."

A Jerusalem Relief Worker's Story

WO days after I sent my letter reminding you of my subscription to your paper, three numbers of paper arrived, and I was so hungry it that I read every word in them enjoyed it all. Now to partly pay all the trouble I have caused you, to let your many readers know ething of conditions over here, I nt to tell you some of the interesting ngs which come to our notice day by .

The saddest sight I have ever seen pened in Taiybeh, the Ophra of the le. I had gone over to help distrib- garments and to look into conditions. had almost finished our task, only a up of orphans being left to investi- e. I had entered a tiny dark room d was writing the names of these little es left destitute, when I heard a wail- , and then a sad cry of lamentation. aid to my interpreter: "Let us see o has died." We stepped out into narrow, steep path between the ildings, and there we saw a company people, all crying. In their midst a woman in rags, and holding her nd was a little girl about ten years , also in rags. Every few minutes the other would give one piercing cry, and en the people would take it up, until most every one in the whole village as joining in this display of grief. Again demanded to know who had died.

The interpreter looked up at me with ars in her own eyes as she said: "She ent away full and she has come home npty. When she left here she had a usband, three sons and this one daugh- r. The husband was killed while with e Turks; the boys have died one by ne. The last one, aged thirteen, was ick for three months. She walked and arried him in her arms until she reached Doora, only an hour's walk from here, and there he died. There she buried him and has come back to the empty spoiled home."

I asked what she would do, and was told that she would live from house to house with the neighbors until she could get a little together again. I called the woman to me and told her I would send some clothes for her and the little girl. I had the pleasure of doing this and also of seeing her employed in the Red Cross sewing-room which we have established in that village; but I shall never forget her sorrow-stricken face or her bitter cry.

The happiest sight I have ever witnessed was the bright, beaming faces of the little ones at Christmas, when each one was given a dolly made of cloth in the Red Cross work-rooms in Jerusalem. They were dressed dollies. Some were dressed like Moslem women with veils over their faces, some had fur caps on and curls over their ears, and these were quickly recognized as Jews. Others had the dress of the farmers, some were schoolgirls, and some Russian men. The women who made and dressed these dolls even cut off their own hair to sew on the cloth heads. My! how the children loved these dollies! They carried them everywhere and at last went to sleep with them in their arms.

I have seen happy children in many parts of the world, but I have never seen such radiant joy as was on the faces of these little ones when they received their Christmas dollies. It so touched one big man from America that he could not keep the tears back.

I thought children in heaven must look something like that.

A Necklace for Dolly

By LAURA A. KIRKMAN

"I WISH I had some beads to make a necklace for dolly!" Edmund heard his younger sister say.

"Let's make some beads out of beans?" he suggested. "If mother will give us some of those white beans she uses to make baked beans of, we can paint them with my water-color paints, each a different color."

Mother gave Edmund a handful of the beans and he made a brilliant necklace, not only by painting each bead a different color, but by painting stripes, stars, dots—in fact, all manner of designs—on the "beads." As fast as the paint dried, his little sister strung them on strong thread by running a heavy needle through the center of each bean.

The Savings Stamp in Church Finance

CHURCH methods, to be successful, must be up to date and progressive. This is the reason why many alert and wide-awake church members and workers are going about old tasks in a new way.

Churches, it is proverbial, always need more money. A new organ is desired, perhaps; the building fund is low; the carpets are crying for assistance or the church parlor furniture needs replenishing. Every now and again comes a heavy financial strain and tug.

Some churches, however, have outgrown these trying old conditions. They are working according to newer, easier methods. The Baptist Church at Idabel, Oklahoma, for example, is erecting a handsome new edifice, for the completion of which $20,000 will be required. The funds, as rapidly as raised, are placed in War Savings Stamps until needed, thus earning a high, safe rate of interest every month.

Each of the ten departments of the Baptist Sunday school at Farmersville, Texas, has been organized into a War Savings Society, class funds being set aside for church improvements. Similar plans have been adopted by the Methodist Church at Tahoka, Texas, and the Christian Endeavor Society of Littlefield, Texas. St. Chrysostom's Episcopal Church, Chicago, for some time has been a steady investor in government securities. A boys' Sunday school class of another Chicago congregation, the Church of the Redeemer, Universalist, receives Thrift Stamps for prizes instead of the more conventional books and cards.

Churches all over the United States day by day are realizing the admirable opportunities, personal and collective, offered by War Savings Stamps and the newer Treasury Savings Certificates. War Savings Stamps cost but a trifle over $4, with a maturity value, five years hence, of $5. Treasury Savings Certificates, maturing in 1924 at $100 and $1,000, may be purchased in August, 1919, for $83.80 and $838, respectively, with a purchase price increase of twenty cents for the $100 and $2 for the $1,000 denomination every month. War Savings Stamps and Treasury Savings Certificates are exempt from all taxes except inheritance, surtaxes and excess profits and war profits taxes. They may be converted into cash at any time at exact face value. They may be built up of twenty-five cent Thrift Stamps, if so desired.

Can the Drama Be Redeemed?

Scene from a play staged in a church in Evanston, Ill.

SEVERAL Protestant churches in this country have tried the presentation of plays based on the stories of the Bible. In every case they have reported a widened interest among young people, a greatly stimulated church life, a better understanding of what religion means. But the giving of these Biblical plays is difficult because of the lack of suitable arrangements of the highly dramatic episodes of Scripture.

The Drama League of America, which has its headquarters in the Riggs Building at Washington, has seen that its efforts to bring about a better situation in the field of dramatic offerings can now be extended into a field certain to offer far-reaching results for good, both to dramatic feeling and to religious expression. The League has arranged for a competition in the writing of religious drama. Three prizes, $500, $250 and $100, have been offered for the three best religious plays submitted. There is no restriction as to form, subject matter or length, except that only full length plays may receive the first prize. The religious motive may be found wherever it is to be found, in the Bible, preferably, but the works of all seekers after truth and of moralists and teachers of all ages and all nations may serve as the initial inspiration of the play. It must be spiritual, religious, helpful, and good from a dramatic standpoint.

We are asking leading ministers of all denominations to answer the question that heads this article, and hope to present their answers in an early issue of the Christian Herald.

Trees as Wireless Towers

MAJOR-GENERAL SQUIER Chief Signal Officer of the Army says that during the war the American Signal Corps used standing trees as wireless towers. The discovery dated back as far as 1904, and it was finally proven practicable to use a tree as a receiving station for wireless waves by carrying an insulated wire to the top of a tree, and spreading a small wire netting below. The eucalyptus tree is said to make the best wireless tower. General Squier said, "from the moment an acorn is planted in fertile soil it becomes a receiver of electro-magnetic waves." For our present purpose we may consider, therefore, the growing tree as a highly organized piece of living earth, to be used in the same manner as we now use the earth, as a universal conductor for telephony and telegraphy and other electrical purposes.

Shortly before his death—which oc rred about three years ago—he transferred the institutions to various church boards, in accordance with the dictates of practical comity. Six institutions in the Kentucky counties of Breathitt, Lee and Letcher he committed to the Executive Committee of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. They are Beechwood Seminary, Heidelberg, Ky.; Highland School, Orphans' Home and Hospital, Guerrant, Ky.; Stuart Robinson School, Blackey, Ky.; Brooks Memorial Academy, Canoe, Ky., and Canyon Falls Academy, Canyon Falls, Ky. The progress of this work in recent years has been remarkable. The schools he founded have so outgrown their equipment as to necessitate larger school buildings and dormitories, and a campaign has been begun by the committee whose members themselves proposed to give dollar for dollar contributed by friends of the mountain work.

hristian Efficiency and Self-Control

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THE first chapter of the Book of Daniel contains what is probably the earliest record of an experient with a simple vegetarian diet in rect contrast with luxury and drink. is also a magnificent picture of a rong character carrying through a eliberately formed purpose from religus motives.

Daniel regarded the King's dainties s defiling and persisted in his demand r plain fare against the foolish fears f the court official who had charge of his raining. Down through the centuries here has lingered the superstition, born f bad habit, that alcohol is a desirable ngredient in the food of man. With it as continued the craving for over-ndulgence in food, especially in meats. he results of Daniel's experiment were tartling in ancient Babylon, but have ecome a commonplace in our day.

Our boys and girls, like Daniel and is friends, are in training for positions f service in a Kingdom. They demand f their football and baseball representaives in high school "strict training," which means abstinence from alcohol and tobacco and rich foods; and frequently a popular hero becomes almost a social outcast because he breaks trainng. But loyalty to Christ is a higher claim still, and Christian Efficiency is a slogan that will attract our youth. They who are to battle by the side of the Master must sit at his training-table, must be willing to "fast" from some things with him. If a mere pugilist will put himself under a strict regimen in order to be fit to fight, can we not call upon our young crusaders to "exercise themselves unto godliness," as Paul demanded? He makes the appeal to strive for the mastery, to be temperate in all things, to "be prepared" for the race of life.

The benefits of Daniel's training showed themselves quickly. Many an individual has proved the same for himself, by abstaining from indulgence and cultivating simple food, good exercise and a reverent mind. Now whole communities are showing, in part at least, its collective benefits. We read regarding prohibition: "Better conditions, better business, less trouble; would never go back to license." Sir Robert Borden says that the suppression of drink in the larger part of Canada has been effective "sufficiently long to realize and confirm the expectation of great benefits—moral, industrial and commercial."

There is a wonderful value in comradeship of effort. When it is difficult to hold out against bad custom, there is strength in a group banding together in non-conformity. The Daniels can help the weaker boys who find it hard to stand temptation or a little teasing.

One of the big dangers of the present is the cigarette nuisance with its war-born popularity. There is no doubt that it menaces the health and morals of our young boys in their growing years. It is absolutely fatal to their mental efficiency in school work. Let us appeal to the boys today as to Daniel's attitude in view of these known facts. Does a boy of thirteen violate his Scout oath to keep himself physically clean, mentally awake and morally straight when he uses tobacco?

Efficiency is a positive code, not merely a mass of negatives and restrictions. Self-control to the boy or girl involves the will to stick to the course of study, to be one of God's trained leaders in the new age of service. It involves the will to be useful in class and church, to be not easily provoked and not quickly discouraged, to see things through. It involves good health, and here the story of Mr. Roosevelt's will to build up a strong body to serve his fine mind is the heritage of all young Americans.

"COUNTRY"

(One Fresh-air Child to Another)

By W. CAREY WONDERLY

I'VE been 'way to th' country,
  And, say, you ought to see
 The things I've seen!
The grass is always green,
  And you can set on it—oh, gee!
No cop to make you run
  Like in the Park—
And flowers you can pick
All day; now ain't that slick?
  Aw, country's fine!

And then there's pigs an' pigs—
  So cute an fat!
A fellow'd never think
A little porker'd be so pink
  And nice and all o' that!
But they are, too!
  You bet your hat!
I used to say I didn't want to go,
But that's because I really didn't know.
  Aw, country's fine!

And cows! I never guessed
  They were so awful nice,
And sort o' mild;
They wouldn't hurt a child
  No more'n any mice!
And chickens! . . . Tommy, pal,
  Not lonesome, hope?
Aw, pshaw! maybe next year
They'll send you 'way down there.
  Aw, country's fine!

World's Chief Coal Exporter

THE United States seems likely to become the world's chief coal exporter. Exports from Britain have fallen from 73,400,000 tons in 1913 to 37,000,000 in the year ending June, 1919, while our exports, something over 19,000,000 in 1914, were nearly 26,000,000 in 1918. Germany will have almost nothing for export.

Bohemian Folklore

WITH the advent of the freedom of Bohemia from the tyranny of Austrian control comes to light many a beautiful fact of the simple yet graceful home life of the Bohemian people which has heretofore remained unknown to a world that knew but little of Bohemia, except as an Austrian province.

Bohemian traditions are rich with a folklore and folk music that is as beautiful as it is simple and sweet.

In the days long gone by, when the thunder and the lightning broke in noisy crashes and zigzag streaks about our home, the children, gathered within the shelter of mother's arms, heard again the story of Mezzulina.

"Listen, children," mother would say, as she had said during every storm of thunder and lightning that chilled our childish hearts, "listen, children, and I will tell you the story of Mezzulina."

Then, during the hush, between the crashes of thunder, mother told the story of the ill-fated Bohemian queen, captured by the enemies of her country, and placed in a tower dungeon, alone, without food or drink, her own countrymen unable to bring her aid, for the wicked king would kill them all. Here she died, fair Mezzulina, who would not betray her country into the hands of the enemy, but her voice has been heard in the soft winds of the evening wherever Bohemians have been gathered, the world over, and when the thunders rolled and the lightning crashed, the voice of Mezzulina was again heard by her Bohemian countrymen, in anguish and distress.

"And this will continue," mother would add, "until Bohemia is freed from the oppression and tyranny of her enemies!"

Mezzulina's wrongs are requited! For Bohemia has been made free!

A Live Wire at Eighty-five

MANY women have led lives filled with activity and good works, but few are so vitally alive at the age of eighty-five as Miss Elizabeth Charles of 111 Manhattan Street, New York City, who has recently mastered the typewriter. Here is a brief summary of the achievements of this unusual woman:

Miss Elizabeth Charles

Miss Charles has raised and educated five orphaned children; she was a pioneer suffragist and has kept up her interest and work in this organization; she was one of the earliest Prohibition advocates and has done her share in furthering this cause; she has been a member of, and worker in, the Methodist Episcopal Church for fifty-seven years.

For twenty-five years Miss Charles has been a subscriber to the Christian Herald.

"Even to the Giving of His Life"

THE death of Bishop James W. Bashford recalls this striking incident: At the Niagara Falls conference in September, 1917, when the Missionary Centenary program for $80,000,000 was under consideration and just before the vote was taken, Bishop Bashford arose and said: "I trust that no man will vote for this program unless he is willing to put it across at whatever personal cost it may mean to himself even to the giving of his life. With that understanding I am ready to vote for it with hands."

Bishop Bashford stood with hands raised, and every man in room stood up.

What a year or two of training at St. Augustine's School does for Negro boys

Out of nine former pupils of St. Augustine's School who attended the training school for officers at Des Moines, Iowa, when the United States declared war on Germany, six received commissions as lieutenants in the army. St. Augustine's has a yearly attendance of 500 and has a hospital which is run in connection with the school. More equipment and a larger endowment are needed to help the school turn out educated, industrious, patriotic young men and women whose lives will be an asset to their own race and to our country. It is the hope of the Episcopal Church as a result of its Nation-wide Campaign that it will be able to expand its work here and in its other schools for Negroes.

he subjects of play and play demon- tions and the Interchurch World Movement and community churches were discussed.

Much interest was shown in the religious side of the work; this was especially true when the subject of community churches was discussed. Various rural life problems were presented and discussed at the round table sessions of the Conference, one of the most interesting being one where the rural pastors and churchmen discussed their problems. Many of the students attending the summer quarter at the Iowa State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts took advantage of the opportunity to attend a number of the conference sessions. Many of these students took an active part in some of the round table discussions.

3. An alert, forceful, interesting handling of the topics of the day.

Why doesn't Your Boy Like His School

THE average boy hates school. He sees no reason for it. He seldom goes beyond second year in high school. Fathers, mothers: what wouldn't you give to show your boys in a boy-natural way just how much school really means to them! The publishers of The American Boy assigned William Heyliger, a favorite writer with their 500,000 boy readers, to do just this. After a year spent with practical educators everywhere he has written "High Benton", about a boy who first hated school and why he came to like it. This great story starts in the September issue of

THE AMERICAN BOY

It's an entirely different school story, a fascinating, absorbing story that your boy will read eagerly. He'll live it himself. It puts school in a new light. Gives him his bearings on what school really is for him. You owe it to your boy's future to put this story in his hands. School opens in September. "High Benton" starts with the September American Boy. Buy it at your news-stand, 20c, or subscribe, $2 a year.

Hens Lay While Moulting

E. J. Reefer, the poultry expert, has discovered a scientific product that hastens the moult and revitalizes the organs of the hen and puts her in fine laying condition. The tonic is called "More Eggs" and a package of it is enough to carry the ordinary chicken raiser over the entire moulting season. First to lay is first to pay. Since using 'More Eggs' I get forty to fifty eggs a day instead of eight or nine," writes A. P. Woodard of St. Cloud, Florida. A million dollar bank guarantees that you can have your money back if you want it. So, you don't take any risk. Send $1.00 (which includes 4c war tax), for a season's supply of "More Eggs" Tonic. If you want to hurry the moult and get more eggs, act at once. It means more profit for you. Don't wait, but order today. Send $1 today to E. J. Reefer, C949 Reefer Bldg., Kansas City, Missouri. Or ask Mr. Reefer for his valuable poultry book, free, that tells the experience of a man who has made a fortune out of poultry.—Adv.

Questions and Answers

W. H. S., Waco, Texas. I have been a Christian all of my life—brought up by parents who maintained the family altar, led me to Sunday school and kept me throughout preaching hour, and when I became a man and started a home I followed the example of my parents and maintained a family altar in my home. I have been faithful to the Sunday school and also to the Church in all its departments, and at all times have been close up to my pastor. Have filled almost every place in the church to which a layman is eligible. What I would like to have you discuss, or to have your host of subscribers consider, is the fact that the Church at present is very far from that which the Bible teaches it ought to be, as I understand it. Galatians 5 : 22-24 says that the fruit of the religious life is love, joy, peace, long-suffering gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness and temperance. I have been traveling over a large part of the Southern states for a number of years and am still active in church work, and a member of one of the most prominent churches in this city, but I am forced to say that my observation has been that the great majority of church members have not love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faithfulness and meekness. My observation has been that the majority will drive a sharp bargain; that they have not kept God's laws, except when convenient, that their greatest ambition is to lay up money on earth, that they love themselves, and that an effective and vital home religion has been relegated to the haunts of the octopus and the dens of the troglodyte. John 12 : 32 says "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." My observation is, that this is not being done at the present time. My contention is that the teachers of the church are not stressing to their people the 33d verse of the 5th chapter of Deuteronomy, to walk in all the ways which the Lord commanded, "that ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days in the land ye shall possess." I also contend that it is not stressed that the people should not have other gods; that they should remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy; that the children do not honor father and mother; that the church does not stress the discontinuance of covetousness. If I am wrong, I would like to be set right by other business laymen who enjoy an experimental salvation and are spending their money and energies actively at work in the church today.

Our Waco friend is sharply critical, and perhaps a little too apt to judge. As a traveling man, he is likely to see more of the religious surface than the undercurrents. To sweepingly condemn all because of the shortcomings of some would be illogical as well as unjust. It has been our experience that practically every church has its quota—some larger than others—of earnest and effective Christian men and women, who live sincere and godly lives and try, in a simple and unostentatious way, to obey the divine will. They may be numerically small, in many cases they are so; yet they are not without influence. Never have we known a church that was wholly without a spiritual leavening of this sort. However, there is a good deal of truth in our friend's observations. The question suggests itself: Where lies the responsibility for such conditions, in churches where they are in evidence—in the pulpit or in the pew? Is there not a remedy which if rightly applied would awaken the sleeping spirituality of a church such as he describes? We will await the comment of other readers on these points, reserving meanwhile our own opinion.

Mrs. F. N., Hot Springs, Ark. It usually devolves upon the president of a missionary society both to conduct the meeting and to see that there is a meeting to conduct. Two things are important: an interesting program and the courage and tact required to make it run smoothly. In most societies the meeting is opened with prayer, followed by the reading of some missionary passage in scripture, then a song or two, then some distinctly missionary feature, either the reading of a letter from a missionary or a chapter from a missionary book, or a discussion of some missionary problem. The program must be short, interesting and well worked up. You should have a program committee. You can probably get in touch with one or more missionaries to whom you can write. Their letters will stimulate interest. It is a good plan also to make some of the meetings social.

Reader, S. C. What became of the Star Spangled Banner which was Francis Scott Key's inspiration in writing our National Anthem? Is it well preserved?

The flag is now in the United States National Museum, Washington, D. C. During the battle of North Point, in which the memorable song was written, this flag flew over Fort McHenry. It was struck many times during the bombardment of the fort. A portion of the flag containing one star was shot away.

Anxious Reader, Albany, Ala. 1. We think you ought to take the matter up with your pastor, and obtain his advice as to the repetition of the ceremony. 2. Husband, wife and children should, wherever it is possible to do so, worship together at the same church. Where both husband and wife hold the same essential truths, this should not be difficult.

"Distressed," Morrisville, Pa. Your question is one that has been asked continuously since the beginnings of time. Job inquires: "If a man die, shall he live again?" The full meaning of the gift of eternal life, however, came through the revelation of Jesus Christ, who, in many passages in the Gospels, gave such assurances to his disciples as cannot be misunderstood. (Matt. 8 : 11; 17 : 3; Luke 16 : 23; Phil. 3 : 20; Heb. 12 : 1; Rom. 14 : 12; I Thess. 4 : 13-18; Eph. 3 : 15; Rev. 6 : 9, 10.) Paul speaks of the "cloud of witnesses" who are watching the progress of those who are still here in the world. This is an experience which many spiritually-minded Christians have had, and which some of them have recorded for the comfort and encouragement of others. They feel that those whom we call "dead" are nearer to us than ever before—no one knows how near. And it is difficult to banish the thought that their interest in those who remain is not wholly lost. And we know that Jesus himself, the Master of life and death, has our loved ones as well as ourselves in his keeping until the blessed time of reunion hereafter. David, speaking of his child who had passed away, cried out in his agony of heart: "I shall go to him, but he will not return to me." He had firm reliance on ultimate reunion hereafter. Jesus speaks of sitting down with the saints and patriarchs, which implies not only reunion, but full recognition. In his parable of Dives and Lazarus, the same idea appears, illustrating not only recognition in the future state, but interest extending even over the border that stands between time and eternity. Practically everything beyond these points is speculative; yet it is surely permissible—where there is a heavenly interest in earthly things, even among the angels who rejoice at the repentance of some poor sinner below (Luke 15 : 7)—to hold that this interest may go further than we can think.

F. D., Davenport, Ia. The world's coal production is estimated as follows: United States, 6¾ tons per capita yearly; Great Britain, 6 tons; Germany, 3¾ tons; Austria, 1 ton; Spain, ¼ ton; Russia, ¼ ton. Last year 685,000,000 tons were mined in the United States.

Mrs. G. A. L., Dixonville, Oregon. The passage in Matt. 24 : 30 relates to the Second Coming. Yet some of the leading interpretative authorities, including Jameson, Fausset and Brown, hold that there is a meaning behind the words employed, which justifies the belief that the passage may cover a wide period of time and a series of events, rather than a single event, complete immediately. They hold that it tells of a series which begins with "the description of a vast temporal judgment upon organized bodies of men, for their incurable hostility to the Kingdom of God upon earth. THEODORE ROOSEVELT

THE MAN AS I KNEW HIM

By FERDINAND COWLE IGLEHART, D.D.

of the Editorial Staff of the Christian Herald

am for the square deal"

DOCTOR IGLEHART has written for the Christian Herald (to publish in book form) his appreciation of Theodore Roosevelt, from an intimate friendship of many years. The Author cooperated with the Colonel back in the strenuous days when Colonel Roosevelt, as Police Commissioner of New York City, made the saloons obey the law on Sunday closing. For over 20 years, the two had been intimate friends. Dr. Iglehart honors in this appreciation the memory of a great personality who has left a warm spot in the hearts of all Americans.

WHAT THE REVIEW OF REVIEWS SAYS:

THE books about Theodore Roosevelt begin to make their appearance, one after another, and within a year or two the number of them will be considerable. It is understood that e are soon to have Mr. Bishop's authorized biography, based rgely upon Roosevelt letters and papers. There will be essays, stimates and tributes from many sources. Meanwhile there will lso be popular volumes, some of them mere compilations made ut of newspaper clippings, and others genuine books written out of good deal of knowledge and from the standpoint of the particular uthor.

One of these now appearing entitled "Theodore Roosevelt, The Man as I Knew Him," has been written by the Rev. Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart and is a book that will hold its place just as some of the ooks about Lincoln have survived as written by neighbors or associates who knew him intimately. Dr. Iglehart—who has had a long areer as one of the most eloquent of the Methodist preachers and as one of the leaders in the temperance movement—has always had a talent for politics, and through the whole of Roosevelt's career the older man was a profound admirer of the younger. Through a great part of that career the preacher was the warm and devoted friend of the politician and statesman.

Dr. Iglehart's biography of Roosevelt is intensely personal. It is the kind of book that will be read with sympathy and pleasure by old and young in many a modest home. The book will be a family treasure for one reason above all others, namely, that its hero-worship is genuine from beginning to end. It does not try to be a critical estimate of the Rooseveltian period in American politics, nor a philosophic study of Roosevelt's personality. It begins by giving Roosevelt a sure rank with Washington and Lincoln, and then proceeds to tell the story of his boyhood, his youth, and his manhood, in a very readable, unsophisticated fashion that does credit not only to the robust American manhood of the subject, but also to that of the nature-loving, humane and large-spirited author.

The chapters in Mr. Roosvelt's early official life are here restated with delightful freshness, and with many touches of new material in the way of anecdotes and illustrative sidelights. As a very skilful public speaker, accustomed to hold popular audiences, Dr. Iglehart understands the use of anecdotes and the personal appeal. Knowing Colonel Roosevelt well, he had many conversations with him at different times, as had many other friends of the Colonel. But most of those friends would not now be able to write out a statement of such conversations, giving the Colonel's own vernacular. Dr. Iglehart perhaps made notes at the time. However that may be, he manages to reproduce a great many conversations which are excellent reading and which are positive additions to the stock of material which the public will be glad to possess. Dr. Iglehart is able to tell us more than most of the Colonel's friends knew in answer to questions regarding religious views and personal characteristics. He has several chapters dealing with such matters.

The reader will regard it as not less appropriate than convenient that Dr. Iglehart has found space to give us some of the memorial tributes that were called out soon after Colonel Roosevelt's death. He has included that of Archdeacon Carnegie in Westminster Abbey, that of Mr. Chauncey Depew, a fine one by Bishop Luther B. Wilson of the Methodist Church, and at greatest length the superb oration of Henry Cabot Lodge in the United States Senate. The address of Charles E. Hughes is also given at length, with those of Chairman Will H. Hays and Gifford Pinchot. Dr. Lyman Abbott's tribute in the Outlook is reprinted, as are estimates by Gen. Leonard Wood, Secretary Lane, and Chancellor James R. Day. Gen. Goethals contributes an original chapter about Mr. Roosevelt's relation to the Panama Canal, and Dr. Albert Shaw has written a chapter at Dr. Iglehart's request on Mr. Roosevelt's characteristics in the office of the Presidency.

In one or two concluding chapters, Dr. Iglehart compares some of the great achievements of Roosevelt with the labors of Hercules. Thus the book is not merely a labor of love and appreciation, but it is an unusual book in its range of fresh information. It will be welcome in that it sustains so fully the best of the Roosevelt traditions. The nation likes to believe in its leaders; and the spirit of hero-worship is still eager in its quests. Americans like to believe that Roosevelt was highly worthy of affection and honor; and Dr. Iglehart's book will do much to convince the next generation as well as to satisfy contemporaries.

Corrected according to the Peace Terms. The new boundary lines are shown in red, as well as the maps o the world in colors; the Atlas contains

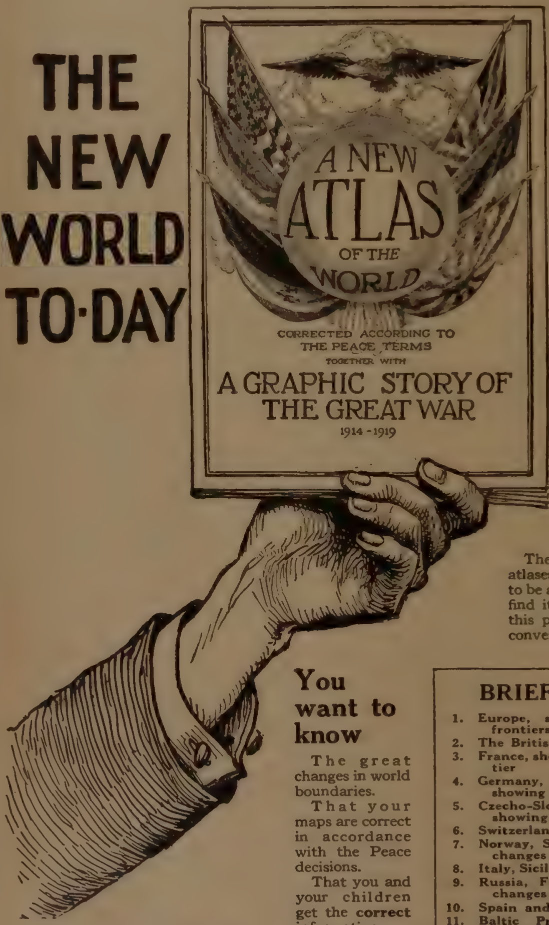
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD foresaw the extraordinary demand that would arise for a new and fully corrected set of World Maps as soon as possible after the Peace terms were signed. Their representatives started early and made a thorough investigation of the making of maps. A contract was made with a firm of map engravers with an unquestioned reputation for correct map making and beautiful color printing. This firm of map makers has a duplicate set of the large base maps of the world used at the Peace Conference and which were used as the guide in making the Christian Herald New Atlas of the World.

The order for the Christian Herald Atlas calls for a 64-page book, printed on fine paper, to be bound in stiff paper covers.

There are 32 pages of new maps in full colors, and corrected according to the Peace terms, and 32 pages of text, making a splendid and graphic story of the Great War from the assassination of Duke Francis Ferdinand on June 28, 1914, to the signing of the armistice and the surrender of Germany. A table from the War Department shows our total battle casualties and number of Distinguished Service Crosses awarded to each division; also how to identify each division in the Regular Army, the former National Guard and the National Army. You will see at a glance how each division stood when the armistice was signed.



THE NEW WORLD TO-DAY

CORRECTED ACCORDING TO THE PEACE TERMS TOGETHER WITH A GRAPHIC STORY OF THE GREAT WAR
1914-1919

The Christian Herald New World Atlas is the first to be published in the world since the signing of the Peace Treaties and has already received high praise from leading members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives. It is selling at the rate of many thousands of copies daily.

Extracts from letters of commendation received from members of the

UNITED STATES SENATE

Senator David I. Walsh of Massachusetts—"I find it extremely enlightening and convenient, and I should think that everyone who is interested in studying the results of the world war would wish to possess one."

Senator Walter E. Edge of New Jersey—"This is not only interesting but also extremely valuable."

Senator Davis Elkins of West Virginia—"This Atlas will prove very helpful and instructive to the American people."

Senator George E. Chamberlain of Oregon—"A hasty examination of this Atlas convinces me of its merit and of its worth, and I am sure that it will be of assistance to me in studying the new map of the world, which the War has compelled to be made."

Senator Knute Nelson of Minnesota—"This Atlas will certainly be a great help to me in my work."

Senator F. M. Simmons of North Carolina—"I consider this Atlas a very useful publication."

Senator Wesley L. Jones of Washington—"This Atlas is a very valuable little publication and should be in the hands of everyone interested in the world war, and I presume that this is pretty near everybody in the world."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Representative Anthony J. Griffin of the 22d District, New York—"I think you should be complimented upon your promptness and enterprise in disseminating so useful a work as this Atlas."

Representative William L. Nelson of the 8th District, Missouri—"This Atlas is a valuable and timely contribution."

Representative Frank Park—"This Atlas is the first I have seen on this line. From the statement that the maps have been made and corrected by Messrs. Matthews, Northrup & Co., it seems to me is sufficient guarantee that the maps are as nearly correct as it is possible to make them at this time. The maps show some great changes and the history of the battles of the World War and Nations engaged, set forth therein, are very instructing and interesting."

Representative John McDuffie of the 1st District, Alabama—"The New Atlas of the World is most instructive. It is the most concrete and at the same time thorough reviewal of the situation throughout the whole war that has yet been published. It is certainly well worth the price. I congratulate you upon the skill with which this document has been arranged."

The Peace terms having defined the changes in boundary lines of the countries affected, old atlases, maps, and geographies are now obsolete and useless. All who want to be informed and to be able to discuss intelligently the great changes made on the maps of the world by the war, will find it imperative to have a new set of corrected world maps. The Christian Herald makes this possible and has done so quickly after the Peace terms were signed, and in book form, both convenient and lasting for reference.

The Cause of Stomach Acidity and Fermentation

How to Remove it in 48 Hours

By R. S. Thompson

I were asked to sound a health warning that would be of the greatest possible benefit to mankind, I should emphatically—"Beware of acid ach." For acid stomach is the cause ermentation which, bad enough in f, is the forerunner of a hundred ills sap the energy and vitality of its ims. I venture to say that ninety cent of all sickness starts with acid nach. Yet the cause of stomach ity can be removed in 48 hours!

ature provides hydrochloric acid as one of the stive fluids, but too much of this acid causes entation, hurries the food out of the stomach, carries the acid all through the body. As a equence, poisons (toxins) are formed which bsorbed into the blood, causing autointoxica- nervousness, mental depression, and count- ills of which this is but the beginning.

very one of the vital organs in time becomes cted—the heart, the liver, the kidneys, the stines, the nerves, and the brain all decline, the stomach is the Power Plant of the body. n the teeth are affected by acid stomach, for gums recede and pyorrhœa will be the result.

omach remedies only neutralize the acid be- e they are stronger than the acid. This ulti- ely ruins the lining of the stomach. The acid g neutralized is absorbed into the blood only ome back to the stomach in greater quantities he next meal.

ow much more sensible would it be to attack disorder at its source. Instead of attempting neutralize the acid after it has formed, why prevent it from forming in the first place?

uperacidity is caused by wrong eating, and the edy must be found in the field of the cause— ating correctly.

he individual sufferer from indigestion, acid- fermentation, gas and such disorders has not ied his experiments with food very far. If he he could easily cure himself in 48 hours, as ene Christian, the famous food scientist, has ved beyond all doubt.

he reason which led Eugene Christian to take the study of food in the first place was because himself, as a young man, was a great sufferer n stomach and intestinal trouble.

o acute was his affliction that the best special- of the day, after everything within their power failed, gave him up to die. Educated for a or himself, Christian could get no help from brother physicians.

Believing that wrong eating was the cause and that right eating was the only cure, he took up the study of foods and their relation to the human system. What he learned not only restored his own health in a remarkably short space of time, but has been the means of relieving some 25,000 other men and women for whom he has prescribed with almost invariable success even though most of them went to him as a last resort.

Christian says that all stomach and intestinal disorders, with their countless sympathetic ills, are caused by wrong selections and wrong combinations of food, and that right combinations of food will positively remove every stomach and intestinal disorder by removing its causes.

No one would think of putting salt into an open wound, and yet we do worse than that when we keep putting irritating acid-creating food combinations into our stomachs already surcharged with acid.

The word diet is one which has an unpleasant sound—it makes us think of giving up all the things we like for those we have no taste for. But Eugene Christian's method is entirely different—instead of asking his patients to give up the things they enjoy, he prescribes menus which are twice as enjoyable as those to which the patient is accustomed.

Christian believes in good foods deliciously cooked—the kind all of us like best and which may be obtained at any home, store, hotel, or restaurant. He says that most of the things we eat are all right—but that we don't know how to combine or balance them.

Often, one food good in itself, when combined with another equally good food, produces an acid reaction in the stomach; whereas either of the foods alone or eaten in combination with some other food would have been easily and perfectly digested.

Unfortunately, each food we eat at a meal is not digested separately. Instead, all of the foods we combine at the same meal are mixed and digested together. Consequently, if we eat two or more articles at the same meal which don't go well together, there is sure to be acidity, fermentation, gas, and all kinds of digestive trouble.

At Eugene Christian's New York office there is a constant stream of men and women who go to him for treatment after having tried everything else, and rarely are they disappointed in the outcome. Some of the results he has attained read like fairy tales. I know of a number of instances where his rich patrons have been so grateful for their restoration to health and energy that they have sent him checks for $500 or $1,000 in addition to the amount of the bill when paying it.

There have been so many inquiries from all parts of the United States from people seeking the benefit of Eugene Christian's advice and whose cases he is unable to handle personally that he has written a course of little lessons which tells you exactly what to eat in order to overcome the ailment which is troubling you.

These lessons, there are 24 of them, contain actual menus for breakfast, luncheon, and dinner, curative as well as corrective, covering all conditions of health and sickness, including stomach acidity, constipation, and all intestinal disorders from infancy to old age and all occupations, climates, and seasons. They also tell you how to reduce and how to gain.

With these lessons at hand it is just as though you were in personal contact with the great food specialist, because every possible point is so thoroughly covered and clearly explained that you can scarcely think of a question which isn't answered. You can start eating the very things that will remove the causes of your disorder the day you receive the lessons and you will find that you secure results with the first meal. Many people who have suffered for years from acid stomach find that their ailment vanishes completely in 48 hours.

THE MOVIE-MAN AT MONT-LAWN

Mr. Patterson tells them all to have a good time

HERE they come, 75 new little guests. I must stop what I am doing and run down to welcome them, some scared and pale-faced, others all excitement, climbing out of the stage and trying to see everything at once. I don't wonder, after leaving the dirty streets of New York City, to find the boys and girls eager to see Mont-Lawn in a hurry—and then the movie man taking our pictures.

We enter the Bath House just in time to catch the first group of boys under the warm showers washing away all the grime and fright. Then on to the playground—chute the chutes, see-saws, swings, giant strides, all going, alive with 300 happy children, and in the midst our hurdy-gurdy playing the familiar tunes of the city streets.

Dear friends who have helped Mont-Lawn to grow, how I wish you could have seen it all—the cottages, the chapel, Fort Plenty and the spacious velvety lawn big enough for all the children to play ring games with plenty of room, so unlike the crowded streets from which they come!

I hope those of our readers who cannot visit us will have the opportunity to catch a glimpse of Mont-Lawn from the movie-man's camera, for the International Film Company have sent out in their News Weekly a film that tells the whole story of Mont-Lawn.

THE children are taken from the stages to the Bath House, where they are carefully examined by our resident doctor. Then they are given a warm shower bath. Meanwhile their little bundles of clothing, sometimes very scant and ragged, are undergoing a similar process in our sterilizing room. During their stay at Mont-Lawn frequent trips to the Bath House are made, and how they do enjoy it!

Said one little Irish girl to her teacher, "Can't I go to the rain-house where it rains on me? I like it!"

But what they like more is to attack Fort Plenty, which they do three times a day. I wish you could see how they enjoy the meals!

The other morning after my shopping in Nyack was finished I drove down to the river to see the boys. Some were building bridges, others throwing stones into the water or chatting with their teachers. They surely were a happy and contented group of boys. Then I drove over to Rockland Lake, about a mile and a half away from the Home, to see the girls. There they were in a large field, enjoying their crackers, which they always took with them on their walks. They too were a happy lot of girlies, picking flowers or admiring the beauty of the lake.

Our afternoons are usually spent on the playground, where the children have a good time playing. They never seem to weary of the pleasures provided for them. Bedtime comes only to soon.

I AM told by the workers that the children come back full of enthusiasm for the hymns and songs learned at Mont-Lawn, teaching them to those in the Sunday schools, nurseries and settlements who have not had the privilege of a ten days' stay at The Children's Paradise. One song is particular this summer is sung as no other, "The Men of Our America." You can hear the chorus almost any time ringing across the field.

A recent visitor said, "I never knew boys could sing like these boys do." I replied, "We have no trouble in getting good music from the boys at any time."

The dormitory is another pleasant surprise. Here many of them for the first time "wash up" before going to bed and have the new experience of wearing clean nightclothes. After having said their evening prayers, the teachers tell some good-night story that brings pleasant dreams.

"Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me."

I have received a number of letters from parents and church and settlement workers expressing gratitude for the care and good time given the children. These letters ought to cheer the heart of every one who has contributed toward the work:

"Our party of forty children returned last Wednesday after ten happy days at your summer home on the Hudson. They seem to have enjoyed the country so much and all of them have gained several pounds and a good healthy tan.

"We want to thank you for your kindness to them and also to say that any time you may have any vacancies, we should be glad to fill them. It is too much to hope that you could give us even a small party of ten after so large a party; however, if any church should have difficulty in filling an order, please member that we have a large number of children draw from. CHURCH OF THE SEA AND LAND."

"DEAR MOM: Tell Louis that I have fun. Some we have, candy every day, I and my friends are ca boys. Don't send no more letters. I am getting This air is great. We go down near the river. going up the Hook Mt.

"Daddy Long Legs: x x x x x x x.

"Mother: x x x x x x x.

"Louis: x x x.

"Good bye.

"My loving Mom and Pop."

"DEAR TEACHER: My little girl arrived home and she tells me she had a lovely time. You see was her first time away from home and we won how she behaved. You see, it's hard for her to en her vacation in the city, as I have to work and has to mind her brother. She tells me she hated come home. The eats were swell, also the outings took her on. Hoping to hear from you,

HER MOTHER,"

ENDEAVORERS CRY "COME ON"

The Challenge to Larger Service Sounded at the Great Buffalo Conference

By
Rev. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

THE recent International Conference of the Christian Endeavor Societies, though not one of the huge conventions numbering tens of thousands which have often been held in years, was yet one of the most important and in- ng of the long series.

deed, size was not striven for this year. The ering was called a "conference" rather than a vention," since the conference features were hasized as never before. The lack of low excur- rates, the high cost of living at the hotels, and impossibility of planning far in advance because he long war and the no less sudden and unex- ed peace, led the leaders to plan for a useful confer- of workers rather than for a great mass meeting.

evertheless, for almost any other organization Christian Endeavor, this meeting with its thou- ls of delegates, its crowded auditorium, its over- ing workers' conferences held simultaneously in churches, would have been considered a tre- dous convention. Its program covered nearly ty finely printed pages and was carried out with few of the inevitable breaks which must always r when some three hundred speakers are sched- to take part.

he two British delegates, Rev. John Pollock, the ident of the European Christian Endeavor on, and Mrs. W. Moffat Clow, the eloquent presi- t of the British Christian Endeavor Union, were unhappily prevented from being present be- se of their inability to get passage on any trans- ntic steamer since Uncle Sam's returning troops preempted all the space.

on. William J. Bryan was also unable to get to Conference because of the serious illness of his ved wife, whose sickness was made a subject of yer by the delegates. Mr. Bryan, however, sent sermon he was to have preached on Sunday t to the Convention, parts of which were read.

resident Wilson's name did not appear upon the gram, although it was hoped that at the last mo- t he might be able to come to speak on the gue of Nations, the subject so near his heart. he has, as President Cleveland once said of him- "Congress on his hands," and at the last moment t the following kind note declining the invitation Buffalo, which I will venture to print in spite of personal character, since it shows his estimate of istian Endeavor:

"DEAR DR. CLARK: Your letter of July 23 gave a great deal of pleasure and reassurance. I can assure you that your confidence and approval mean a vast deal to me.

"I dare not hope to be present at the biennial meeting to which you so generously invite me, but you may be sure that my heart will go out to the assembled friends and that I know what I am missing in missing the opportunity to address so great and influential a body on a matter so near my heart.

"Cordially and sincerely yours,
"WOODROW WILSON."

SECRETARY of War Baker gave a most eloquent address on the evening devoted to the Patriotic Pageant and to "rapid-fire addresses" from half a dozen returned Christian Endeavor soldiers, some of whom had specially distinguished themselves for bravery. These soldiers had held high offices in the United Society or the State Christian Endeavor Unions, and have returned to their labors in the society.

Secretary Baker's earnest appeal to carry on the work for freedom and a regenerated world begun by the brave boys in khaki opened all hearts to him, and his restrained yet powerful appeal for the League of Nations brought forth an immediate response and a unanimous vote in favor of it, which was forwarded to the President and to the Senate.

Dr. Poling, the associate president of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, preceded Mr. Baker, and was no less eloquent as he told of Christian Endeavor and Christian Endeavorers at the front in war and peace, drawing on his own experiences in his two war-time visits to France.

The shadow of the late war and the foregleams of the coming days of peace naturally threw their mingled light and shade over the Conference, and one of the most interesting sessions, though a brief one, was devoted to a memorial service for the Endeavorers who fell in France or died in the camps at home. At this session Dr. Amos R. Wells, the poet of Christian Endeavor, read a beautiful poem, and the Endeavorers, standing together, raised their right hands and pledged themselves to live for the great causes for which ten thousand of their comrades had died, saying after the leader, as he propounded questions of loyalty to God and country, "This for me! This for me!"

Here are the dedicatory questions asked and answered:

"Our comrades warred not only against mortal enemies but against war and the fiendish cruelties of militarism. Shall we who remain enlist in this as yet unwon war?

"They fought that the submarine and the bombing-plane and poison gas and the noisome trench and the spirit for which these things stand might not embitter and dominate the lives of our children's children. Shall we fight so that these forces of the evil one found in all lands shall not dominate the world?

"They died that not might, but right, as God gave them to see the right, should rule our land. Shall we live—for the same great end?

"They dedicated their lives to the reign of the Prince of Peace. Shall we dedicate our lives to the reign of righteousness under the Prince of Peace?"

AT THESE great meetings the president of the United Society is accustomed to give a "keynote message," which in a considerable degree outlines the plans and gives the watchwords for the coming two years. This year Dr. Clark declared that leadership, work for the unemployed, and lasting fellowship, were the needs of the Church as well as of the nations, and that it was the especial business of Christian Endeavor to train leaders for the church, to furnish work for unemployed young Christians, and to promote Christian fellowship among the young Christians of the world. He concluded his address by proposing the following goals for the coming two years, and the rallying-cry for the societies, all of which were adopted substantially, and most heartily:

"We will challenge one another in this convention for these results and thus provoke to love and good works. Two years from now we will celebrate the fortieth anniversary of Christian Endeavor. Thus far the Lord has led us on. That we may have during these two years simple, definite goals, by attaining which we may show our gratitude for the twoscore years of divine favor, I suggest for your consideration these five:

"1. A fifty per cent. net gain in the membership of every society within two years.

"2. A Christian Endeavor Society in every available church in every state, or, if not, we will know the reason why.

"3. A definite goal in every state for denominational missionary gifts, especially in connection with the proposed denominational 'drives' and inter-church world movement.

Trustees, officers and field secretaries of Christian Endeavor representing more than twenty denominations

The Christian Endeavor Convention, Buffalo, N. Y., August, 1919

"4. A field secretary for at least part time in every state and province.

"5. A Sustaining Alumni Association in every Union

"Vigorous efforts to attain these goals will develop the leaders, will furnish the tasks, will promote the loyalty and the larger fellowship for which I plead.

"A well-known missionary leader closed a ringing challenge to evangelize the world with two words, 'Come on!' I too will adopt them. Come on for a great campaign of loyalty, loyalty to our churches and to these principles of Christian Endeavor: obligation, which is the heart of the pledge; unabashed, outspoken devotion, which is the heart of the prayer meeting; systematic service, which is the heart of our committees; united service, which is the heart of our unions.

"For pledged service, come on; for outspoken service, come on; for systematic service, come on; for united service, come on. Thus will leaders be raised up, great tasks will be found and undertaken, our Lord's last prayer fulfilled. Then come on.

"For our motto and our slogan can we have a better than the familiar words of our pledge, 'Whatever He would like to have me do?' 'Whatever,' a tremendous word! 'Whatever,' in speaking, doing, being, living, giving. 'Whatever,' O Endeavorers, realize its breadth and length and depth and height. 'Whatever,' in church, in Sunday school, and in Christian Endeavor. 'Whatever,' in home, in community, in country. 'Whatever,' in business and politics.

"Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I will strive to do whatever he would like to have me do. This is our great, our blessed, our joyous task. I summon you to undertake it. 'Come on!' and the equally hearty and prompt response, 'Let's go!'"

A WONDERFULLY lively session was that devoted to the challenges above suggested in this address. The delegations from the different states were divided into two groups; about twenty state delegations assembled in the First Baptist Church and twenty or more in the North Presbyterian Church. The challenges came thick and fast, state to state, local union to local union, single societies to the field, for increase in the number of societies, of members, of local unions, for the largest numbers of proportional givers, for Comrades of the Quiet Hour, for Life-Work Recruits, for the greatest State Convention in the coming year, for the largest number of mission study classes, for the most "Alumni Fellowships," etc,

Pennsylvania to Illinois, Texas to Massachusetts, New York to California, Ohio to the field, North Carolina to Maine, Arkansas to Florida—I d pretend to give the exact challenges or the stat which and to which they were presented. The lenges were for the most part accepted with greatest readiness and often with much hil while state songs and slogans rang throughout great auditorium. Much good fellowship as w much generous emulation will come, I am convi from the challenges to enlargement and improven This whole session was a happy exemplificatio the apostle's words, "Provoke one another to and good works."

THE Alumni banquet was another session lon be remembered. Nearly a thousand Endeav sat at the banquet tables, and a national Al Fellowship was launched, which promises to do things for the cause. As colleges depend upon alumni for their support in any emergency, so deavorers who have been through the training se for religious service which the society offers will and support their Alma Mater. It is estimated there are many more than ten million people livi America today who have received some part of religious schooling in a Christian Endeavor Soc

The individual societies give their benevo money through their own churches and denom tions, and neither the United Society of Chris Endeavor nor the World's Union of Christian deavor ask anything of the Society for their sup The extension of the work depends largely on dividuals who are graduates of the society. The ing hour, which followed the presentation of Alumni plan, was the most hilarious of the con tion. In a few minutes over $5,000 were pledged the world-wide extension of Christian Endeavor, the cheers and songs that accompanied the ple showed that the Lord would love these givers; they were certainly "cheerful," and indeed, acc ing to the more literal rendering of the apost words, "hilarious givers."

Many gave as many dollars as they had been y in Christian Endeavor. Mrs. Francis E. Cl who claimed to be the oldest alumna, since she been in the society from the first day, made a ple for $38 and the odd cents to stand for the thi eight years and six months and four days of the of the society. Many who became Endeavor thirty and thirty-five years ago gave similar su Many gifts of $50 and $100 were pledged. Gen Secretary Shaw, who has been for thirty-six years official of the society, and who, greatly to the grie all Endeavorers, at this meeting resigned his off pledged for himself and wife $1,000. The Clevel Union handed in a check and Liberty bonds amount to another thousand.

The Dire Need of Polish Protestants

By Rev. Dr. JOHN PINDER, Evangelical Pastor at Cholm, Poland

A FEW years ago, before the war broke out, I had the honor of writing to you and getting your reply, but since that time every intercourse was interrupted. I was transferred to Poland, into the town of Cholm, where I am preaching the Gospel in Polish and German in the town itself and in many surrounding places. Great provinces are open before me, longing for a word of consolation from the Word of God; but alas! the troubles of the war raging here are hindering every access!

I should like to give a description of the present condition of the Evangelical Church in Poland. It is a deplorable one.

The Protestant population, amounting to about half a million souls, consists chiefly of small farmers and officials, most of them of German parentage, who having settled in the country and whether they have turned Poles or remain Germans, are all of them true to the Evangelical faith. Before the war our church was a flourishing one; churches and schools were scattered throughout the land. But alas! how things have changed!

In August, 1915, the Russian general in chief gave orders that all the Protestant German colonists must leave their homes within twenty-four hours and be transported to the inner parts of Russia, to Siberia, Caucasus and so on. The people were hardly able to catch up the most necessary things for the journey. Before the time was gone the Cossacks burned their houses, and many children were barely saved from the flames. So the poor emigrants were driven like a herd of cattle, by foot, by miserable carriages, by trains crowded to suffocation, to the Far East, the children crying, the women weeping and the cattle lowing. Many children lost their parents, others died on the way; women swooning, old people dying from exhaustion and grief.

After three years, in the autumn of 1918, when the great change in Russia occurred, they were permitted to return home again. After many troubles and dreadful adventures they reached their homes in Poland, and found their houses burned or occupied by strangers, their barns and cellars empty, no bread for men, no food for cattle. Their chattels were stolen or entirely destroyed. Their churches and schools were burned down or torn asunder. At Kamien, near Cholm, a very beautiful evangelical church stood. This beautiful church of Kamien and all the surrounding buildings are entirely burned down. Only the damaged brick walls remained, within which a young forest of birch saplings is growing now. The poor evangelical population is weeping at the church walls as the Jews weep over the destroyed Jerusalem. When will this church be restored again! Alas! we are too poor to restore it.

But that is only a single specimen; all the churches and schools are destroyed; we have very few pastors to preach the Gospel, and few teachers to teach our little ones. In former years our pastors studied at the University in Dorpat, Russia. Now we don't belong to that country, and the Dorpat schools are destroyed. Where will our young pastors study? Shall we send them to the German universities to embrace the higher criticism there? Between the Germans and the Poles a great dissension and aversion exists from the times of old. Our Catholic neighbors would consider us Germans and be opposed to us if we did so. It is an absolute necessity to have a school of our own for the education of our pastors, as we wish to educate them not in the spirit of the higher criticism but in the spirit of the Gospel as it is found in the Bible Institutes of Chicago, Los Angeles, Springfield, under the leadership of the late Mr. Moody, Dr. Torrey, or the late Mr. Spurgeon.

But the difficulty is that we are very poor. Our ecclesiastical property has been robbed from us by the war, and in these times everything is exceedingly expensive and dear. Besides, we are observing a peculiar movement among our Evangelical German countrymen. Many of them are selling their property and ground and waiting for the time when the German boundary will be opened. Then th will return to the country of their forefathe But it is only the rich ones who will return to G many; the poor ones must remain here, havi no means to go elsewhere. They will want spirit care and material help, but will not be able to bri any offerings for the cause of the Gospel. Where sh we get the material means in order to maintain o schools and churches and to fulfil our Christian a evangelical duty to the poor and neglected ones?

HE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEEK

The Treaty of Peace

PRESIDENT WILSON submitted to the Senate on August 11 the American draft of a League of Nations Covenant which the te had been anxious to compare the draft finally incorporated in the y of peace. While in the main the documents are similar, there are wide differences. Senators were cularly interested to learn, how- that the most widely criticized ision of the Covenant, the famous le X, pledging the United States arantee the ter- al integrity and tical indepen- e of other mem- of the League, adapted from American plan. he other hand, plan proposed the President e no reference, ctly or indi- y, to the Mon- Doctrine. It ained a clause anteeing free- of the seas, but was eliminated he Paris Confer- . The Wilson provided for a rning body of gates consisting the diplomatic esentatives of contracting ers accredited he seat of the rnment of the gue. This clause ld have given vote in the as- bly to the Brit- Empire. Article in the completed enant, covering same ground, vides for "representatives of the nbers of the League," which gives six votes to the British Empire. Critics of the President find in his draft no provision for safeguarding American sovereignty over purely domestic questions, and no provision for American withdrawal from the League.

The fight over ratification of the treaty was intensified by the refusal of the President to submit notes, reports, discussions and other papers used in the negotiations at the Peace Conference. Efforts were made by some of the Administration leaders to force an early vote on ratification, but a group of Republican members of the Foreign Relations Committee insisted that they must have fuller information on reports that governed the decisions of the the American delegation. Indications are that the committee will report on the treaty to the full Senate about mid-September. Reservationists say they have assurance of Democratic support for at least five reservations. Senator Lodge, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, in delivering his long-awaited formal address on the treaty, outlined five reservations which he said he would insist on. The Senate gallery was filled with marines from the Second Division, and they provided an unusual feature of the afternoon by wildly cheering the Senator's attack on the League of Nations. President Wilson, August 19, met the foreign relations committee and heard the substance of two amendments and five reservations which the majority say they will demand.

Pershing Coming Home

GENERAL PERSHING, after completing a tour of the battlefields in France from the Vosges Mountains to the sea, left Paris on August 2 for Italy. There he visited the famous Italian battlefields and bestowed American decorations on large number of Italian officers. The commander-n-chief leaves Brest for New York the first week September. A national welcome is being arranged or him in New York. The picture shows him eading the American regiment which participated London's great Victory celebration. Kolchak Government Falling

THE army of 100,000 men supporting the Omsk government which is headed by Admiral Kolchak has retreated some 800 miles since it began to break against the Bolshevist forces in eastern Russia. Town after town, village after village, has been given over to the Communists in the withdrawal into and through the Urals. Omsk itself on August 11 was in danger, and active preparations were being made for its evacuation. Official advices received in Washington on that day said the government was tottering and that unless immediate aid reached it there was almost no chance of standing against the eastward rush of Bolshevism.

Thus far there are no indications that the United States or the Allied Powers will take further steps in Siberia. England's military support is being withdrawn now. English troops have been closest to the Ural front, and English and French officers have been intimately associated with the Kolchak régime. The British cabinet, however, decided late in July to cut loose from all Russian military entanglements and ordered the troops to return home. The American contingent in Siberia, numbering between 8,000 and 9,000 men, have strict orders to do nothing but protect the Trans-Siberian railway, and its activities are strictly limited to territory five miles on each side of the line.

Only a negligible amount of war material is going forward from Vladivostok to the Kolchak forces, and the latter are almost destitute, not only of guns and munitions, but of food and clothing. On the other hand, the Bolshevist army seems to be well equipped, well trained, and well led, largely by German officers who took service with Lenine and Trotzky after the armistice.

In view of the fact that the United States and England have decided on a non-intervention policy and are willing to give nothing to Kolchak but moral support, observers are unable to see how further opposition to the Bolshevists can be maintained. Without Kolchak, all of Siberia is open to them. And Kolchak seems to be doomed.

The situation in Omsk is further complicated by the presence there and along the railroad in the immediate vicinity of nearly 200,000 refugees from the evacuated districts. Typhus is epidemic, and the small American Red Cross detachment is almost overwhelmed with demands which it is impossible to meet.

New British Ambassador

ANNOUNCEMENT was made in the House of Commons on August 13 that Viscount Grey, who as Sir Edward Grey was British foreign minister for several years before the war and until 1916, had been appointed temporary ambassador to Washington. There has been much criticism of the Lloyd George government, in view of the importance of many questions that need attention, for not filling the Washington post, and the designation of Lord Grey, even as temporary ambassador, meets with general approval. The new envoy retired from active service because of ill-health, which threatened complete blindness. Happily his sight has been saved. The most pressing of all the problems he will find awaiting him in Washington are the readjustment of the complicated financial relations between Britain and the United States, growing out of loans and credits advanced by this country, and the negotiation of treaty revisions made necessary by the radical changes in relations growing out of the war.

The Lansing-Ishii Agreement

SECRETARY of State Robert Lansing, testifying before the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee on August 11, said that during the negotiations which ended with the signing of the Lansing-Ishii agreement by which the United States recognized Japan's "special interests" in China, Viscount Ishii "concealed" the existence of secret treaties with the Allied powers, assuring possession of Kiaochau to Japan. Mr. Lansing disclosed that it was on his initiative that the negotiations looking toward the agreement were begun. He believed it was desirable to reaffirm the American policy of the open door in China, and took advantage of Ishii's presence here as head of a special diplomatic mission to suggest conversations. Viscount Ishii said he thought any agreement should recognize Japan's "special interests" in China.

"I replied that I was willing to state that Japan had a 'special interest,' but not a 'political' interest in China, and I objected to making an agreement without defining and limiting the term 'special interest,'" said Mr. Lansing. "I said that if it meant 'paramount' interest, I could not discuss it further."

The American and Japanese interpretations of the agreement, as finally signed, differ radically, as the State Department has been informed by its representatives in the Far East. Japan has encouraged both her own nationals and China and Korea to believe the

A Race for Perfection

BRINGING the spirit of competition in its very finest sense into community life—a competition in which every man, woman and child must enrol if their community is to make a serious bid for success—has developed a movement with possibilities for good almost immeasurable. The goal is civic perfection.

Back in rural West Virginia the people have erected for themselves an ideal toward which they are striving, and already twenty-three communities have entered in the race. With the assistance and encouragement of three state activities, the Department of Schools, the Department of Public Health and the State Sunday School Association, they measure their own gains, estimate their own failures and fix their own scores. Their approach to excellence is scored by points that relate to standards of good living.

THE idea had its inception in three little communities where the residents were progressive enough to see the need of self-improvement and decided to undertake it in a spirit of friendly rivalry. These pioneers were Grangeville, Marion County; Salt Well, Harrison County, and Martha, Cabell County. They established their scoring system, assuming the perfect community as 1,000 points, and called in state experts to aid them in working out the details of their fascinating game.

Neighboring towns and villages, when they heard of the movement, clamored to get into the race, and one by one others have been added until now there are twenty-three entered.

The survey for a starting-point was completed in the case of the original three centers two years ago, and in the second year's scores Grangeville showed a gain of twelve points and Salt Well of seventeen, while Martha lost seven points.

The scoring takes into consideration nine general headings: history, government, business, farms, clubs, homes, schools, churches, and health. These are supposed to determine the strength and virility of the community. To illustrate the working of the system, an examination of Salt Well's gain of seventeen points shows them distributed in this way: one point, better lighting and heating in the church; four points, increased use of the school building for regular work and as a social center; one point, installation of bathrooms, running water in the kitchens and other home conveniences; three points, better farming; two points, development of the community club; two points, increased activity of young people in high school work.

At the same time, the town suffered a loss of two points because of negligence in government and lack of interest in elections.

AN ANALYSIS of the nine general considerations that it has been decided govern the growth and development of the average community might serve as a guide for other centers that are inclined to make an inventory of their value to themselves and the country at large.

History takes first place for the reason that it supplies a background for all community life. The locality, in the West Virginia scheme, must have had a definite village or township life for a period long enough to develop a certain tradition and standard. It is considered desirable that there be a large proportion of the families firmly fixed to their homesteads, but at the same time there should be a leavening of newcomers who either rent their homes and land or have newly acquired them. Neighborhood quarrels, jealousies and animosities engendered by religion, politics or business, also are taken into account in establishing the initial scoring point. Public pride, as illustrated by discouragement of advertisements on barns and fences and of ill-kept fence rows or grounds which fall under the control of the community, and an appreciation of rural beauties, are likewise considered under the general head of history.

Closely allied with history is government. A score of 1,000 points means elections free from bribery and other corrupt practices; appearance at the polls of all registered citizens; independence in voting, which is shown in split tickets and by changes in party alliance; reasonable familiarity with the men and methods in county, state and national governments; an understanding of the purposes and accomplishments of state institutions of various kinds; full enforcement of all laws; a just tax rate willingly paid on just assessments; wise and honest handling of public funds; no arrests for violation of the criminal law, or lawsuits between citizens, for two preceding years.

UTOPIAN? Perhaps, but you see this is the 1,000 point town.

Business qualifications comprise: a fair amount of trading with outside markets as well as the production for all-year needs of meat, milk, eggs, vegetables, fruit and butter; real service and fair profits in merchandising; adequate transportation services; frequent mail deliveries; efficient telephone service and good management of private and public business. All this presupposes no unnecessary idleness.

In the perfect score the divisions of history, government and business are regarded as worth 100 points each. The same value is placed on the last five of the nine headings, but the fourth—that of the farms—is worth 200 per cent.

Stimulation of good farming was one of the big reasons for establishing the competition. Among the special considerations that enter into the scoring are the type of farming suited to the region; the size of farms in relation to the available man-power to work them and to provide a year-round employment; well-kept farm records; control measures in use for checking diseases of plants and animals; fertilization on scientific principles; crop rotation and products; proper breeding, feeding and management of live stock; use of labor-saving machinery and adequate and well-arranged buildings.

Club life has come to have a place of importance in the country even more influential than in city life. There are community organizations with definite plans of work and regular times for meetings either at an established center or in homes. Community meeting-places, such as school buildings, halls and churches, are generously used. "Get-together" assemblies, including farmers' institutes, exhibits, family reunions, home-comings and camps, are encouraged. Especial stress is laid on the development of a spirit of neighborliness, with an understanding and an appreciation of the ordinary social usages. Any tendency in the youth to vulgarity, unnecessary roughness or bad conduct of any kind must be guarded against, and the people generally make provision for convenient play and athletic grounds, and encourage their use. Bands, glee clubs, baseball teams and shooting clubs have a part in the community life.

THE importance of the home is reflected in the attention given to it in the system of judging. The first consideration is the externals, which include location and the proper placing of the buildings; the type of architecture in so far as its appropriateness to the country is concerned; the placing of outside doors and porches and their use; the care of the home with regard to its painting; clean and sanitary yards, well-managed gardens and neat and well-tended shrubs, trees and flowers.

Inside the house the questions deal with right decorations, suitable pictures, wall paper and sanitary construction; practical furniture suited to the rooms; modern housekeeping equipment; well-planned housework without loss of energy; cleanliness, ventilation, arrangement and freedom from all kinds of vermin, and well-selected clothing. The material, moral and intellectual development is considered under such questions as apportionment of money between necessities, savings, religion and benevolence, pleasure, lectures, musicales or other forms of recreation or mental improvement, and the liberal use of good magazines, books, government bulletins, farm papers and daily or weekly newspapers. In the ideal community educational, religions and other general interests, including sex hygiene, are discussed in the home and made a part of the home life.

School scoring provides for eight grades, separated or consolidated, unde care of teachers receiving adequate salaries assured of the full and cordial support of pa and school authorities. High school advantages be provided and made use of by the children. school buildings, equipment, library and playgro must conform to the highest state standard the buildings must be used as a social center. teacher must be a leader in community organiza must be neat in dress, faithful, industrious, enthu tic, able to meet people, and interested in child Long tenure of position is desirable. Class-room should have particular application to the nee the locality, and the course of study should inc in addition to the customary school elementals topics as agriculture, home economics, manual tr ing, nature study, home geography and farm a metic.

THE religious development guards against a great number of churches. The buildings sh be adequate and used for community needs, and must be well located and properly constructed, lig and heated. Sunday school officers and teachers be well trained in the most progressive met and classes or departments segregated and equi with blackboards, maps, tables and graded teac material conforming to the International Sun School standard rating. Church membership show a growing and harmonious congregation. members must be recognized by the neighbor possessing Christian virtues which they apply their day-by-day business and social affairs. To tion of other beliefs and encouragement of inte nominational cooperation are important factors, is a well-thought-out and well-balanced finan policy.

Health is the last of the nine general headi The qualifications here cover the water and supply; the disposal of refuse and manure in gene and the proper enforcement of all state and l health laws. Drinking water must be safeguar by methods endorsed by the public health vice. Closets must be built according to pl approved.

ROADS OF REMEMBRANCE

This bald cypress, standing in the village of Santa Maria del Tula in southern Mexico, is the oldest tree in the world, its age being estimated as between five and six thousand years

WAR-TORN France has already commenced the building of roads and the planting of trees. Four great mountain roads are to be relaid and rebuilt in the upper Vosges, ding from France into Alsace.

Vimy Ridge is to be a vast memorial park to the nadian soldiers. Pitted as it is with shell-holes and ters made by mines, it can never be turned again agricultural land; and so the Canadian govern- nt will plant on it the maples of Canada. It has n suggested that in the same way the Argonne made an American park, a shrine hallowed by the od of American soldiers. A plan is now being urged Roads of Remembrance in France, which will d from one famous battle-ground to another.

"The great army that died must ever be kept in embrance," Clémenceau has said.

No finer memorial can be built than a tree-bordered hway, and, aside from sentiment, there can be no ter investment for any community. The planting one tree for each of the casualties of the American peditionary forces would mean 297,147 trees, and in numerous cases whole groves or even forests might well be planted for a dead hero or group of heroes. State and local authorities everywhere are joining with the Federal Government in this connection, aiding and abetting the efforts of individuals and societies. There will be tree-lined "roads of remembrance" everywhere—striking and useful memorials to the brave men who fell in the world war.

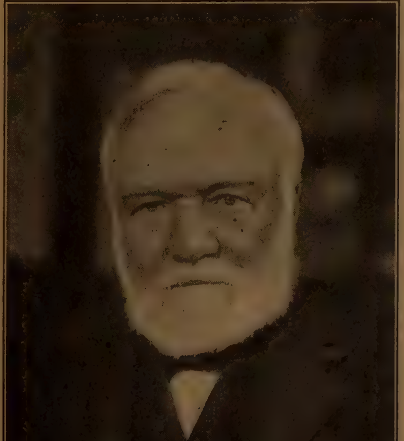
This work properly carried out will mean in time a memorial highway across the United States. This could be readily and quickly accomplished by lining trees on both sides of the Lincoln Highway, which runs from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast. Other great highways may be built, north and south, as well as east and west.

Something more is involved than a sentiment. The best friend of a road, as of the traveler, is a shade-tree. Extremes of temperature, such as come on a blazing summer day with a downpour of cooling rain, heave and crack the unshaded roadbed, opening it to the ultimate ravages of frost and thaw. The war has taught us what this may mean, financially and otherwise. Before 1914, according to Robert Sterling Yard's "Book of National Parks," Americans spent $286,000,000 annually in foreign travel, mainly in Europe. For five years travel has been largely confined to the United States. This country is richer by a billion dollars or more, and richer also in self-knowledge. The Adirondacks, in which a network of good roads runs through vast tracks of forest, yearly attract hundreds of motor tourists from the Middle West. The advantage has been reciprocal. Returning motorists, for local emulation, have aided powerfully in passing a good roads appropriation. Michigan alone has voted $50,000,000, and a part of the appropriation is to be used to plant the wayside with the different species of forest trees. Oregon has voted a bond issue of two millions and a half for the Roosevelt Military Highway, and there is little doubt that the National Government will appropriate a like amount. The primary purpose is to connect the widely separated strategic points on the Pacific Coast, but the chief use of the highway will doubtless be by tourists attracted by the wonderfully varied and little-known beauties of the Oregon coast. The Army Motor Transport Corps has already started from Washington on a transcontinental run which is serving as a nation-wide demonstration of the need of good roads. Secretary Baker has ordered that the road-building equipment which our army used in France be returned and distributed among the states for use in the construction and maintenance of Federal-aided highways. It includes 1,590 caterpillar tractors, about 400 steam- and gas-driven road-rollers, numerous concrete-mixers, rock-crushers, and road-graders. The Forestry Association will make every effort to insure that the planting of trees keeps pace with the building of roadbed.

The Road of Remembrance and the shaded highway have a more immediate connection with the general problem of reforestation than may at first appear. Very soon they will become bases for the advance of veritable armies of trees. Nature unaided may be sure, but she is slow. The industrious squirrel carries acorns, hickorynuts, walnuts, and chestnuts a rod or so before he buries them—and unfortunately often forgets his cache. The winds carry the seeds of maple, pine, and linden a little further. The shaded highway will cross them and the shade trees will scatter their seeds and nuts in the nearby country.

He who plants a tree is building the world of the future. In twenty years a maple will grow to a sturdy tree, with dense if not widespread shade. And in that time, when wind and soil are favorable, it is already parent to groves of young maples marching from the highway across lands that have hitherto been waste.

ANDREW CARNEGIE



The Ironmaster

PROBABLY no man of wealth has written his name so indelibly upon hearts of his fellow citizens has Andrew Carnegie. The r boy who became the sec- d richest man in America announced as his faith principle that great wealth was a trust to be administered in the interest of all, and that the man who d rich died disgraced. Mr. Carnegie not only clared this his creed, but lived up to it in such literal hion that his benefactions totaled $350,695,650. s wealth accumulated so rapidly that in spite all his giving he did not quite succeed in dying a or man.

An attack of pneumonia two years ago seriously attered the rugged health which had carried Mr. rnegie past the fourscore mark, and a recurrence August 10 quickly brought the end, early on the rning of August 11.

Mr. Carnegie was born on November 25, 1835, at unfermline in Fifeshire, Scotland. His family for generations had been hand weavers; but the power loom t an end to the hand weaving industry. The elder rnegie decided to bring his family to America, where, 1848, he secured work in a cotton factory at leghany City. Andrew went into the factory as a bbin boy at $1.20 a week. He was soon promoted engineer's assistant at a slight increase in pay. is surplus time he spent in reading, the opportunity r reading being presented by a private library of 0 books opened to the boys by a Colonel Anderson. his was the seed from which sprang the Carnegie braries.

At fourteen Andrew became a telegraph messenger; en he practiced telegraphy and became so proficient at, one morning before the operators arrived, he not ly took a message but delivered it. For this he was ade an operator. Later he became a clerk under ivision Superintendent Thomas A. Scott of the ennsylvania Railroad at a salary of $35 a month. ne morning Colonel Scott was late and the traffic the yards was tangled up. Carnegie as private ecretary put on the wire the orders which he knew is superior would give, signing his superior's name. hen Scott arrived, the tangle was straightened out, nd he reported to the President of the road that he ad "a little Scotch devil who would run the whole ad if he only had a chance."

Andrew's father died when the boy was only ixteen years old, and the responsibility of his other's support fell to him. His first investment, y the advice of Mr. Scott, was the purchase of ten shares of Adams Express stock for $600. Mr. Scott rose through various grades and became vice-president of the Pennsylvania in 1860, taking young Carnegie with him. In 1861 he became Assistant Secretary of War in charge of military telegraphs and railroads, and Carnegie went along. After a few months of restoring and creating military communications, Carnegie returned to the Pennsylvania. An investment in a sleeping car patent gave him his first large profits, about $200,000. An investment in oil brought him a quarter of a million He then organized the Keystone Bridge Company for the production of structural iron, which resulted in 1865 in the Union Iron Mills. The mill was profitable from the start.

In 1868 Carnegie became convinced of the value of the Bessemer process, which was in use in England for the production of steel. He introduced it at once in America. In a few years the word Carnegie, rolled into the web of rails and bridge members, made the little Scotch weaver's son known throughout America and the world.

The Carnegie Steel Company was merged in 1901 into the United States Steel Corporation. Mr. Carnegie once ascribed his business success to his ability to enlist in his service men better than himself. For his interest in the Carnegie Steel Corporation Mr. Carnegie received $420,000,000. In an article in the North American Review Mr. Carnegie had written: "The day is not far distant when the man who dies leaving behind him millions of available wealth, which were free for him to administer during life, will pass away 'unwept, unhonored, and unsung,' no matter to what use he leaves the dross which he cannot take with him. Of such as these the public verdict will be, 'The man who dies thus rich dies disgraced.' "

With the cares of business off his mind Mr. Carnegie started out to administer his wealth for the good of the public and posterity. The Carnegie Corporation of New York on the day of his death announced the total of his benefactions as $350,695,653.40 Of this amount, over $64,000,000 built library buildings; nearly $5,000,000 went to colleges for other buildings, and $12,000,000 went to colleges for endowments and other purposes; over $6,000,000 was used to purchase 7,689 church organs. The Carnegie Corporation of New York received $125,000,000, the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teachers over $29,000,000, the Carnegie Institute at Pittsburg nearly $27,000,000, the Carnegie Institute in Washington over $22,000,000, the Carnegie Hero Fund $10,500,000, the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace $10,000,000, the Hague Peace Palace $1,500,000, a trust fund for his native village $3,750,000, a Scotch University Trust

HIS PEOPLE

A SHORT STORY
By TARLETON COLLIER

ONE day in the midst of the hard times Zack Burns, that they called the rolling stone, came home and told Mary Gray to go with him and she might have for her own a little island all white and green in a sea as blue as her eyes. A slender ring of an island with a lagoon like opal within it, full of rainbow fish and pearls. But Mary said no, there was her father and me to take care of.

Then Zack said that she would be a queen out there and have a golden crown, to go along with him. In a little bag he had brought pearls, dull gray things as big as peas, as big as acorns, and one of them as big as any of my marbles; but Mary put her hand over them there on the kitchen table and looked at him and said it wouldn't be for the pearls she'd go, nor a golden crown, if she went; only for the love of the man who asked her.

Zack's hand fell on hers, gentle like, the pearls beneath. They were so close. It seemed they had forgotten I was there, although I was kneeling in a chair across from them, leaning with my elbows on the table and waiting to see the pearls once more, and the picture they somehow brought of brown men diving through a clear, far-away lagoon beside the palm trees, and the rainbow fishes scattering.

"Is that it, Molly?" said he, speaking the name he had always called her. "The love isn't there any more?"

She did not answer him, but walked away to the door, and looked over the pasture with Yarbrough Creek and its willows running through it, out over the pine trees beyond that stretched dark-green to the foot of Mount Pleasant in the distance. I was looking at her, not the pearls, then; it seemed that her eyes saw even farther than the hazy blue mountain and yet nothing at all. After a while she came back, my Mary, and her eyes were blue and steady as she looked at Zack.

I call her my Mary, and she was—my mother and sister and all, since she brought me to live at her home after the last of my family died and all other neighbors were talking of the orphanage. . . . She and Zack were almost of a height, she was so tall. A big, strong girl, with arms round and full, deep in the chest, wide in the hips, and beautiful. Against the clear white and pink of her face, Zack, burned by the sun, seemed darker than I'd thought any white man could be. His hair and skin were the same color, and in his thin brown face the gray eyes seemed bright and bold as he looked and looked at Mary.

"You can't say that," she said, low.

"But you won't come with me?" said Zack. "Why?"

She said nothing, but stared at him. I remembered seeing her look like that once before when her father came home drinking and had one of his spells of crying for her mother out in the churchyard. Zack stared back as steady as she at first, then his eyes sort of darkened and fell away to his lean brown hands. I could see his lips tighten as one by one he picked up the pearls and put them back in the little bag, hardly looking at them. They might have been some pebbles he had brought her, nothing else.

"Mary!" he said, rough. The ugly sound of his voice! "Mary! I'll make you, yet!" All of a sudden he was not so rough. "Oh, Molly!" he said, like you would beg.

Mary turned away quickly to the stove.

"Are there cannibals there?" I asked; but without saying Zack went in two long steps to the door and stood there a while, looking out as Mary had done over the pretty land.

Then Mr. Gray came home, little and tired, and was glad to see him, and made him stay to dinner. Waiting, they laughed, and were loud; but while the men talked and I hung at Zack's knee, Mary kept busy at the stove.

"You come home at a bad time, Zack," said Mr. Gray.

"Oh, the panic?" said Zack, careless. He was grand with that laugh and that shake of his shoulders, like he had asked you what did panics matter to him, even so big a panic as this one that had closed up half the places in town and brought two sheriff's sales.

"I reckon you'll be going back, then?" said Mr. Gray.

Mary stopped for a second stirring something on the stove.

"I'm a king, out there," said Zack.

I felt the blood run hot and cold through me.

"Ho!" cried Mr. Gray. "King Zack the First!"

But Zack said no, they called him something else. I couldn't remember the pattering sound of the word, but he said it meant "Chief-from-over-the-water." Then he told us about the island down in the South Seas, eight days in his little schooner southwest from Honolulu, and only fifty miles or so from the equator.

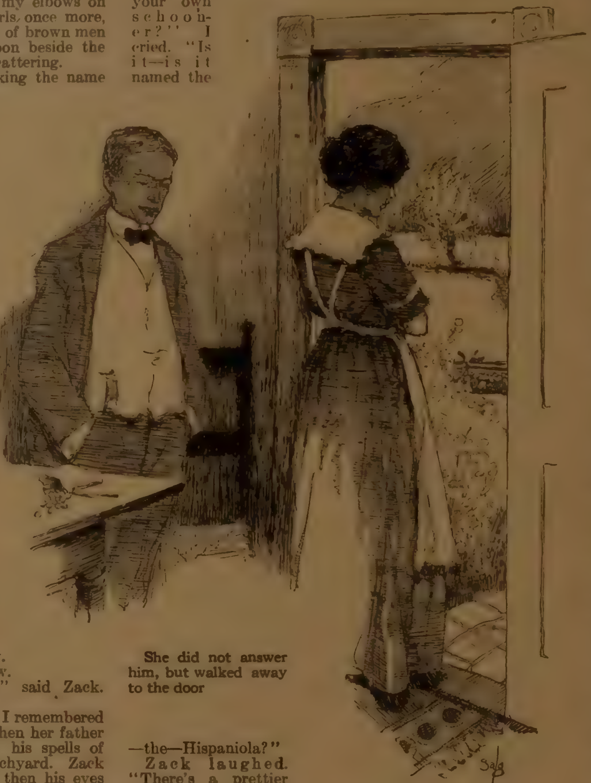
"I know!" said I, thinking of my geography lesson. " 'An imaginary line drawn about the center of the earth.' "

We were sitting down to dinner then, Zack still talking of the island. He wasn't exactly king, he said, there being a big native chief on the next island, and the King of England, who was bigger still, and who gave him the right to trade and look for pearls. A patent, he called it. But after all he was the same as a king, like, to the natives.

"How'll you get back there?" asked Mr. Gray.

"The schooner's waiting in San Francisco harbor."

"Oh! in your own schooner?" I cried. "Is it—is it named the—the—Hispaniola?"



She did not answer him, but walked away to the door

Zack laughed. "There's a prettier name, son, than that."

"Oh!" It seemed I had lost something. "What?"

"The Molly," said he, soft.

Mary was looking out the window, over toward Mount Pleasant, her hands in her lap. She hadn't tasted her soup. Mr. Gray made a sort of noise with his.

"Eat your dinner, Herb," said Mary to me, sharply.

There was a little while that nobody said anything, then Mr. Gray put down his spoon.

"I reckon there's money in it?" he said, meaning the pearl fishing.

"Maybe," said Zack with a sort of laugh. "There's a lot of fun in it, too."

"Lucky you didn't stay here. Money's tight—there ain't any money, I reckon." Mr. Gray gave a little sigh.

"I should worry, out there," said Zack, careless. "It's pretty fine, where I'm a king."

Mr. Gray said yes, he guessed so. He sighed again. "It's pretty hard here. Eight cents for cotton. Everything stopped—even weddings . . . Pat Avery and Ella Blake they had to wait . . . then Pat got pneumonia and died . . . worry, I reckon . . ."

"I'm getting on," said Zack with his little laugh. "Time I was getting married too, I guess, and settling down."

I noticed then that he hadn't eaten anything, either; his eyes had been on Mary all the time. Her cheeks were red, though it was not so warm that day; a fine cool breeze came through the window. We could hear the pines crooning, far away.

"Ha!" said Mr. Gray. "Will it be a princess?

"A princess, yes," said Zack, looking at Mary. she'll have me."

Then we talked of this and that, nothing to co about cotton and pearls and how Mrs. Price come that day to ask for sewing to do. Mr. C did most of the talking. Zack said the hard t didn't matter much, out there.

"Oh!" said Mr. Gray, brightening, like he thought of something. "You wouldn't want to the Yarbrough place, would you?"

"Not on your life!" said Zack.

Mr. Gray sighed again. "No, I reckon not,' said. "Still . . . They're selling it soon. Her this part o' the county we're hoping somebo buy it—give a good price for it. Show someb believes in us, understand? Maybe money'll lo then . . ."

"All you folks need is to wake up," said Zack, less. "You're asleep."

After dinner he said he thought he woul to town, he wanted to see the boys. He driven straight over to our place from the road, not stopping in the square, and there a lot of people he wanted to talk to.

"Oh!" I said, "I'm going too. Can I, Zac

I followed him into the kitchen.

"Can I, Zack?" I asked again.

He laughed. "Ask Mary."

I just looked at her to let her know much I wanted to go.

"If you want to," she said from over dishes, so dull that it was hard to belie was my Mary talking.

Zack and I went out of the yard and d the road until the house was hidden behin by the grove, without either of us saying a thing. Then I asked him to talk some isl talk for me.

"What?" he said, like he hadn't heard "Oh! . . . Oh, yes." He laughed a little said something, a lot of pattering words had music in them, soft like. Though it m have been only the way he said them. So how I knew it wasn't foolishness, nothing laugh at.

"What's that?" I asked.

And he said it was out of the Bible that missionaries preach to the natives out ther Bible like ours only made over so the island could understand. I remembered, when told me, the lesson in Sunday school with same thing in it:

"And Jacob served seven years for Rac and they seemed unto him but a few days, for love he had to her."

"It's pretty, Zack, the talk," I said; " I think it's prettier our way, don't you?"

He stopped and looked sharp at me and t back over his shoulder to where the house w behind the trees. For a little while we wai there. The sunshine came in fine splint through the leaves. A mockingbird was sing somewhere over us, singing like it would us that even with the breeze and the sky the sun and all, there was something we w missing, something to be sorry about. It h like a knife, it was so sad.

"Listen, Zack!" I whispered. "Are th birds out there?"

"Such birds as you never saw," said then, perking up proud, "on my island."

Presently we were walking again tow town, and I said:

"It's fine, then, being a king?"

He held his head somehow higher. "It's—glorio Herb," said he. "Only yourself—nobody to b in . . . All for yourself."

"No hard times," said I, like talking to myself.

"No begging friends," said he.

Then we were in town. I had never seen the pl so quiet, and it seemed to me strange that everybo didn't run out to shake Zack's hand and make a of him. We crossed the bridge and went up the lit hill to the court-house and the square without seei anybody at all.

Zack's face when we went into the drug store a saw the boy behind the counter where he had look for somebody else, was a sight.

"Where's Lin Faber?" he asked, stock still.

Just then old man Asbury, who was reading a pa at a table in the back of the store, looked up a saw us.

"Well!" he says, coming up. "Zack Bur Where'd you spring from?"

Zack shook his hand careless. Nobody ever mind old man Asbury.

"Where's Lin Faber?" he asked again.

"Oh, Lin, he's gone," said the old man.

"Gone? Who's running the place?" asked Zac

"A boy," said the old man. "Boy from Montgo ery that the bank sent up—the bank Lin owed mon to."

"What!" said Zack. "Couldn't Lin——"

"No," said the old man. "Lin couldn't. May lon't know, sonny, these are hard times here. y's tight, nobody got confidence in us here. 'body going away to town . . ."

Ve went over to the post office. The window where Gray sold stamps was closed, as it always was two hours at dinner time.

Huh!" says Zack. "The old town's asleep."

Ve started across the square, and there in the dle we saw J. M. Tuttle the lawyer, walking with head down, and very slow. As he came near he ed up and that was all, then looked again, quick, you do when a face sticks in your mind.

Why, it's Zack Burns, isn't it?" he says, putting his hand. "You're looking fine, Zack. Glad to you."

Thanks," says Zack. "I'm glad to be back."

That's right. Yes. Well . . . Come over to the ce when you've got time."

Then he was gone, walking with his head down, and y slow.

ack turned to look after him, and I looked at k. His mouth was open a little way, and his face s a sight. All of a sudden I felt hot all over for k, sorry and somehow ashamed. I mean, he had n away a long time and seen the world and done t of things; but now that he had come back home was "Hello, Zack!" and that was all. First old n Asbury hurrying to tell Zack about the trouble, n Cary Little, then the lawyer. It seemed I had say something.

"J. M. Tuttle's got lots on his mind now," I told n "Lots of trouble since the bottom dropped out everything and Pat Avery went . . . Pat worked him . . ."

But all the same I couldn't help remembering how en Zack was home before, he and the lawyer hunted gether and fished together and talked together and fed for near a week.

Zack walked faster, getting ahead of me so that I d to run a little at his heels to keep up with him. could just see the side of his face, but that well ough to see a dull red color there beneath the brown. is mouth was tight like when he had gathered his arls in Mary's kitchen, and he said nothing until e sat on the court-house steps and all the square y around us, as quiet as some old sleeping dog in e sun. As I watched Zack out of the corners of my es I held my breath.

"They're trying to stuff me with their little trou- les," said he at last, like he was petulant. "I've ade good. It's up to them."

There lay the old town in the sun. A boy, my age, th bare feet, walked along the shady strip of the uare, hacking with his knife on a piece of board; nd coming to a bench he sat down and whittled some ore, then gave it up, just sitting there and nothing e. Out of the livery stable a voice came singing, nd we could hear the horses stamping in their stalls r the flies. It was between terms and the court-house ffices were closed for dinner, so nobody bothered . There didn't seem much, you see, to the town that adn't time for Zack Burns; but somehow, beneath he quiet . . . and everything . . . you sort of felt here was something else, something strong and wise, hat watched us. Like the drowsy old dog again, or he face of the judge or the doctor.

Zack stood up. "Oh, it ain't the same . . . Herb, un home and tell Mary—tell Mary and Mr. Gray that I'm coming out tonight after supper. Now I've got to drive over to Seven Mile Creek and see Cousin Albert and get that over with. Something tells me," he said, almost whispering, "I'm not going to stay long in this place."

I was at the gate in two shakes

Somehow, I was glad to go. I hadn't thought I would ever feel so, but out there in the square, public like, the town all around us, sort of staring . . .

And I went away asking myself what was the matter. At the corner of the street that led down to the river bridge and home, I turned and saw Zack still standing at the court-house steps, very straight and proud, looking at the town with his head high. Then he moved away toward the livery stable, and I ran down to the bridge.

Mary was sitting in the kitchen, doing nothing, when I got there and gave her the word Zack had sent.

"All right," she said, quiet and a little weary, her eyes never moving from the open door, and the meadow and pines and the mountain in the distance. Then I told her what Zack had said about going away, but she did not answer.

Mr. Gray asked her at supper what was the matter, but she said it was nothing. Spring was getting in her blood, she guessed. Sure enough, spring was everywhere outdoors, and the breeze was soft and the frogs and crickets were calling loud and steady. The early moon had a sort of warm and golden color.

In its yellow light Zack Burns came up the path from the road a little later, walking very slow and softly whistling something that had no tune nor reason to it. His bare head was lighted by the moon, but his feet were in the shadow, so that it seemed he did not touch the earth, but floated in by some magic toward where I waited on the porch. I had come out at the click of the front gate, knowing it was Zack but wanting just to see him and to make a picture of the island on the other side of the world where he walked like this, lordly among the brown men who called him chief.

"Molly!" he called, coming on the porch and passing me without looking at me. I looked up sharp at the sound of his voice; hard it was, like the speaking of an order. Within the house I heard Mr. Gray, startled from dozing over his paper, take up Zack's call, crying out "Mary!" But there was no answer.

Zack went a little way into the hall. "Molly, I want to see you," said he, with a flutter of impatience in his words. He stood there a little while, then went on back to the kitchen, with me at his heels.

"Yes?" said Mary, from the dishes.

"Oh! . . ." said Zack at sight of her, his voice falling to a whisper and then going out. Something or other like a message or an understanding that didn't need words seemed to pass between them as they looked straight at each other . . . I don't know what, except that Zack sort of stiffened, and I was all of a sudden very sorry for him.

He opened and closed his hands and spoke low and blunt: "I'm going back."

"I thought so," says Mary.

There it was again, in three words. All the feeling that had come to me out there on the court-house steps, that things were somehow against Zack, that he was being judged by something strong and calm and hidden, something that I could not see nor understand. I wanted to cry out to them to tell me what, my heart was so big with sorrow and wonder and maybe fear. And I saw the red come slow and dark beneath the tan of Zack's face.

"You thought so?" he asked, queer. "Why?"

She looked steady at him a moment, then turned back to the dishes; and Zack went to her with two quick steps and caught her by the wrist.

"Why do you say you thought so?" he asked low and hot, with his teeth held tight together and showing white between his lips; then he dropped her arm and fell back a little step and cried: "Molly! "What's the matter with you . . . and the town . . . and everybody . . .?"

Mary rinsed a dish before she answered. "You don't know?"

"I'm asking you," he said.

Mary looked at him sharp, her voice rising. "You don't know?" she asked again.

"No!"

She turned to face him squarely, and wiped her hands on her apron.

"What did you come home for, Zack Burns?" she asked in a new, level voice.

"To get you," says Zack with his little laugh.

"Sure," says Mary. "To get something you wanted. That's why you went away from here and that's why you've been going all over the face of the earth. For your pleasure. And that's why you were away when your mother died, nobody knew where until two months later . . ."

Zack dropped his eyes; the red was deeper in his face.

"I was sorry," he mumbled, angry and yet not angry, if it could be so. "You know I was sorry."

"Oh, yes," said Mary. "You were sorry, I suppose. You said you were. And I believe you were. And now——"

She threw out her hands a little way, then let them drop to her sides.

"Well?" he asked, blunt, facing her. "What?"

"Now," she says, "you're content to go back out there—now."

Zack took a step toward her—no, half a step, with a quick thrust.

"Not content—without you, Molly," he says; and the voice coming to me, huddled and scared there in the shadow of the cabinet, seemed to be not his voice at all; so tender.

"Mary!" says I to myself. "Can't you hear!"

And I knew that I was crying.

Mary, she turned quick and walked away to the open door, where she stood for a minute looking out over the land, black and gold it was. Then Zack went and stood close at her shoulder, with his face forward so that he could see her face.

"Not without you," said he, low. "I've wanted you——"

"You think you do," said Mary, "because I haven't come easy at your call. If you got me, likely it would be something else."

"Oh! . . . Molly!" Why, he wasn't a king at all, but a boy, hungry and begging! "The last seven years, haven't you been sure . . . of me?"

Mary answered nothing, unless you could call the quick, tight shutting of her hands an answer; and Zack leaned closer.

"Do you—do you want me to stay?" he asked.

A little higher went her head at that. "I'm not saying." Oh, the pride of my Mary! "The man I love won't need any word from me to show him what's what."

Zack, Zack, don't you see? It's as plain as the very word for telling you yes . . . Oh, Zack!

But then he was begging again, and I felt I ought to hate him, it was so like running away. "Come with me, Molly, where there's nothing to do but be happy. No work nor hard times . . . Why, Molly, out there I——"

She turned on him so fierce that he fell back a little way. "Oh, I know!" she cried. "Out there you're a king, maybe. Money, and all that. All your own. You don't have to stop to think about other people. And you'll be finding it different here . . . now . . . The town seems to have its troubles."

The red was there again, even darkening his eyes.

She went on: "Maybe you've found out from what father told you, from what you've heard in town, about all our troubles. Well . . . these are your people, Zack Burns. They're your father's people and your mother's people. That doesn't mean anything to you, does it? . . . You've come back with strength and plenty of money, and they ask you to help them. Just a little bit. Buy the Yarbrough place, they say. Put some money in the county . . ."

She paused for a breath or two, her face was white. Zack didn't seem to understand.

"But you say: 'You're asleep, wake up! I get along by myself, you do the same.' Oh! . . . There was Pat Avery, turned his back on his happiness, because he wanted to do the best by Ella Blake . . ." Her voice seemed to soften. "And then the pneumonia took him. . . ."

"What was Pat Avery to you?" asked Zack, hot.

"Nothing but—a man," said Mary.

"I suppose you'd like me to come back to this hole in the wall and die, then," said Zack.

Mary made a little gesture. "Oh, Zack, can't you see the big things?" she asked, sorrowful. "You give a mean little sound to my words! . . . I didn't say that, did I? All I said was——"

Like once before Zack caught her wrist in his rough hand. "I've got a right to live my own way!" said he.

Mary looked from his face down to his hand, and it seemed there was the strength in her eyes to uncurl his fingers one by one. Down his hand dropped from her wrist.

"Sure you have," says she, very gentle. Then she cried out, her face flung up: "But you've got to know, Zack Burns, that this town or this world or anybody in it hasn't got any feeling for a rolling stone who doesn't think about anything but himself and his pleasure. Yes, and who believes he can keep on after more dollars and fun when his own people are holding out their hands . . . You've turned them down—all right, you can go your way. They're my people . . . You can go your way!"

AGAINST HIGH FOOD PRICES

AFTER delays that have sorely tried the public patience, the Federal Government, as well as the state authorities throughout the country, is at last fairly started on a nation-wide campaign to bring down the high cost of living. For many months, steadily mounting prices have imposed severe hardships upon our people. They bore uncomplainingly the privations and burdens of wartime, and their unmeasured loyalty should have entitled them to the amplest protection now; yet in many ways the after-war burdens have proved more grievous than the earlier ones. Now, however, Congress is training its legislative batteries against the big and little profiteers, and the state authorities are also getting into action. In many places Citizen Committees will cooperate.

What can be accomplished through this simultaneous bombardment, if it really means business, must soon become apparent. There is a growing conviction in the public mind that profiteering is largely responsible for the prevailing social unrest throughout the country. Hoarding of vast food supplies and deliberate waste of cargoes on market-bound trains illustrate the desperate methods that have been used to keep up prices. These and similar practices explain some of the ways employed to force a rise averaging over 12 per cent. in food commodities generally since the armistice was signed.

President Wilson favors putting "more teeth" in the existing laws, to cope with the reckless class who are responsible for the food situation. We need some strong examples that will bring the whole conscienceless fraternity to their senses. New food laws may be necessary; but direct action in the form of a few vigorous and successful prosecutions would be valuable object-lessons. They would save time in ameliorating the situation, besides affording satisfaction to the public, who have been helpless sufferers.

The food problem overshadows all other domestic issues. It is undoubtedly the root and cause of a whole line of other troubles, and to postpone or needlessly delay its adjustment now would be in the last degree unwise as well as unjust. Human nature has its limits of forbearance, and objects to being victimized in a continuous performance. When these foes of law and order strike at the home, and put practically the whole American people on restricted diet, compelling multitudes to fight daily an almost hopeless battle to get food for their families, it becomes a question just how long such conditions could go on without the limit being reached. It has been reached now. Let the wheels of justice get busy.

A SCATTERER OF MILLIONS

THERE are minds that bear their choicest fruitage late in life. Andrew Carnegie was one of these. It was not until after he had lived threescore years that he began to perceive his real mission: to give to the world a practical illustration of the right uses of wealth according to his best ideals. His long struggle upward, marked by thrift, foresight and inflexible determination, had brought him into contact with many other workers who, like him, had a humble beginning, but who lacked his tenacity of purpose. The story of the struggle reads like a romance. His first Sunday school recitation—"A penny saved is a penny gained"—which was so inept and unexpected that it surprised his teachers, was not so strange after all. He was born in the school of thrift and learned its lessons by hard experience. As bobbin-boy in a cotton mill, engine-tender, telegraph messenger and later operator, he kept on saving, learning, planning, until he himself became an employer of men. Hand over hand, he kept on climbing the ladder of fortune. When the bobbin-boy had become the ironmaster, controlling the labor of thousands, and later when as the "steel king" he came into contact with the leaders in the great enterprises of the time, the apex seemed to have been reached. Wealth rolled in upon him. It was the beginning of an era of great fortunes and his was one of the greatest.

But the mere possession of wealth cannot satisfy the heart of man. In his passage up the hill of struggle, Andrew Carnegie had seen much of the trials and the pitiful failures of the multitude of workers. He had outstripped most of them, but he had sympathetically noted the causes of their failure. And now, as master of $500,000,000, he began to ponder the responsibilities of wealth.

This was the turning-point and the beginning of his new career. When he first gave expression to his views, many were surprised, although his intimates knew his tendency. Man must work, he declared; a life of elegant leisure is a mark of unworthiness. Every citizen owes it to the nation to be useful. How could he pay his debt? He decided that he could do it best through aiding education. "Educate a man and you set him free," was his philosophy. A millionaire is merely trustee of his possessions for the benefit of his fellow men. The climax of the transformation seemed to be reached in his declaration that the time would come when it would be considered a disgrace for an American to die rich!

Then he set about to live his new creed. He sowed his wealth broadcast, joyously, yet judiciously. He gave hundreds of millions to establish libraries and institutes, to endow educational corporations and pension funds, small colleges and foundations for teachers. Always an ardent peace-lover, he gave a liberal international endowment and helped to rear the Peace Palace. His Hero Fund was another idealism, and was a further revelation of his character. These and a score of other projects, all worthy and largely educational, received gifts aggregating $350,000,000 from the man who in his youth had learned to save the pennies. He sought out many of his former associate workers and made them grateful sharers in his abundance. But still he was unsatisfied. Wealth had become a burden, and its entire distribution, as he had planned it, seemed a hopeless task during the years of feebleness that remained.

Andrew Carnegie did his best to carry out the great principle he had held steadily in view for over twenty years. He made an honest and admirable effort to do good with his wealth, and set a worthy example to others. He gave lavishly, but wisely, and never with ostentation. He despised self-glorification in every form. He aimed to help through education and stimulation, never to pauperize. He sowed and planted in many fields, and had the satisfaction before he passed on of seeing the full promise of harvest.

THE CHIEF AND HIS BIBLE

THE American Bible Society in New York tells of an old, worn Bible which was sent to it a few days ago to be rebound. Its pages were elaborately marked in red and black and blue inks. It had used by the owner for five years so constantly that the covers were worn out. It was a full-blooded Indian, Chief Manitowog of a tribe from the State of Washington, who came to claim the book as his. He had had an eventful and checkered history, but by means of that Bible he had found the way to spiritual freedom and a new life. He told how he had read the story of Christ and became his humble follower. For five years the Book had been his constant companion. He studied it page by page, chapter by chapter, and in it he found comfort and assurance of forgiveness and help. As he studied, he marked those pages that appealed most strongly to him. There were so many of these that the task kept him busy. But his study of the Word had been like a divine message in his life, and a transforming power.

We recall another copiously marked Bible which had belonged to one of the noblest men we have ever known. It was the Bible of Dwight L. Moody, who for a whole lifetime had made it his study. He drew from it that inspiration which gave him such wonderful power over the hearts of multitudes that he became the greatest evangelist of his day.

There is a special blessing that follows upon earnest Bible study. In the keeping of His statutes "there is great reward." It is "a lamp to the feet, a light to the path." It makes the diligent student a good citizen of this world and prepares him for a better citizenship in the next. It is the Christian's manual of heavenly citizenship, the library of divine grace and blessing, by reading which a man may become wise unto salvation. This was what Chief Manitowog found in his Bible.

THE SUMMER CONFERENCES

IN RECENT years the Church has suffered from a serious lack of men in its ministry and to some degree from a lack of consecrated laymen to give impetus to its purposes. To a large degree the Summer Conferences and the enrolment at the seminaries has been a gauge of the real vitality of the life of the Church.

Last year the war seriously crippled the conferences and almost drained the colleges and seminaries. This year, the conferences have resumed their old numbers and enthusiasm; but there is a new spirit of service evident in all of them. From the Sunrise Prayer Meetings, where worship seeks to apprehend the
devotion rises to the pinnacle of sacrifice, the gat ings this year have been shot through with ser purpose. Young men and women have come strength to meet the challenge of the new day. T have found it and the life of the churches will this winter the urge of strong young leadership, w has come from Silver Bay and Estes Park and other conferences from sea to sea.

Our seminaries will start this fall with a new thusiasm. The men who stopped their courses go to France have come back with their purposes changed but intensified. And hundreds who never m personal the claims of Christ upon the lives of have seen a new vision and are dedicating themsel to the ministry. Nor is their dedication an indefi thing, for they have seen a vision, some of a r community which needs salvation from econo and social as well as spiritual failure; others of so city where aliens need the gospel of liberty and de cratic equality as well as the Gospel of redeem love; and still others of some far country which c to them as did Macedonia to Paul. And they going to fit themselves for a definite service that t may do it well.

This new spirit in conference and seminary is a part of the re-baptism of evangelical fire which come to the Church at large and which warrants in expecting large things in the months to come.

INDIA'S FAMINE CLOUD LIFTS

MORE cheering news comes from our In Famine Relief Committee and from the m sionaries throughout that country. Chairm Hill, in a letter written on July 4, confirms the g news. He writes that at a number of stations, cluding Bombay, Deccan, Hyderabad (with two ceptions), and the Konkan coast, the rainfall for monsoon period up to that date has been ab thirty inches. The Central Provinces record a simi excess, while Gujerat and Kathiawar report a defi of about two inches, and Sind, up to July 4, was rainless.

But the point of greatest import and cheer is th the fall has been "well distributed over the m sorely stricken areas, and in the Bombay Presiden satisfactorily normal." Meanwhile the monsoon advancing northward in full vigor.

This relieves all further anxiety for the afflict districts, and gives promise of ample food for m and beast in the near future.

The missionaries' letters, too, are full of hope a confidence. They express sincere thankfulness God for the blessing of the rainfall, and gratitude good people everywhere for all the help that has be sent through the Christian Herald and other sourc
They expended our gifts conscientiously in relievi those in desperate need. Of course, suffering w continue until the harvest comes; but the situati is now one that can be regarded with courage a confidence.

BARRIERS OF PREJUDICE

IN OUR approach to the Unity of the Church
God, we must recognize at the very outset th there are to be new and definite adjustments.
are to abandon our aloofness, our contentions, suspicions and our jealousies. With these remove we will pray together, work together, and accompli common results that will add both to the glory
the Church and to Christ.

I do not know whether it is worth while to mal very many statements regarding the creeds. So fe of them are accepted in toto by the various church that hold to them, that they are of themselves findi their place of permanent isolation as Christ com more and more into view; for, after all, religion is n what one believes so much as Whom one believe Speaking for the Protestant churches, I think would go without question that the leaders in the various communions are preaching today very near if not entirely so, one message regarding Christ an his Church; so that it would be best not to distur those things over which there have been severe co tentions, but leave them where they are.

The things we are to sacrifice are not in the realm conviction but in that of prejudice. In matters of co viction there is a Unity which could easily find it manifestation, if prejudice can be removed. The we shall discover whatever spiritual wealth we hav to make it as a contribution to others, and they i turn give to us; so that it is the principle of givin that is to dominate our approach to each other rathe than that of sacrifice. REV. PETER AINSLIE, D.

HE Sunday school is completely graded and in charge of competent officers and teachers. The day school gives $60 per year to missions. One of this amount goes into the Christian Church k and the other half into the Congregational rch work.

The Woman's Missionary Society is making marked progress and divides equally between both denominations when it comes to benevolences. The society meets the first Thursday in each month.

The C. C. Circle (Christian-Congregational) corresponds with what is usually known as the "Ladies' Aid Society." This organization has an artistically printed year book and meets twice per month.

The salary of the pastor is $2,400 per year and each unit pays one half of the salary. Each unit makes up its budget for the year, including all expenses and the apportionment to be sent to denominational headquarters for missionary work. Each year so far has found the treasury of the federation with money on hand. The surplus is divided between both units and goes into missionary work.

A new eight-room parsonage, with bath and garage, modern in every respect, costing about $5,000, is about completed.

The consolidation was not effected to save expense, but to increase church attendance and secure a stronger preacher by paying a substantial salary.

The people interested felt the old régime was not bringing results, and what they wanted was results, and they feel after almost three years' labor that the plan has been successful far beyond their expectations. The success of the movement has been most gratifying. The first year of the federation brought in many of the leading men of the community who had never taken much interest in church work. The membership increased so rapidly that it was necessary to build an addition to the church at the end of the first year. The Federated Churches is not for classes but for the masses. Every one is cordially invited to attend services. The people feel it is "our church." When people begin to feel that way they have a vital interest in the proposition, they get interested. There is a place for each and every one. No one is useless.

The slogan of the church relative to services is "We start on time and close on time." Every one attending services knows the services start absolutely on time and end on time.

The church believes in evangelism and is proving very popular with the men. Many times in the regular services the attendance of the men will equal that of the women. The Federated Church of Mitchell is really a man's church. Music is a special feature of the services.

Originally it was intended to have all the churches of the city enter the federation, but the Christian Church was the only one voting unanimously to come in. The Presbyterian and Methodist people would have come in but outside denominational authority prevented. Those in the two churches who felt they wanted to try this scheme then formed a Congregational unit to federate with the Christian Church and thus produce a federation. This was done, and many Lutherans, Episcopalians and people from other denominations joined the Congregational Church.

DISSENSIONS might have been expected from the union of people from several denominations, but none have developed. Earnest Christian work has characterized the whole body. As previously stated, at the present time people representing eleven different denominations are in this federation working together for the upbuilding of Christ's kingdom.

"Unity" has been the watchword, and it has won. The church is reaching out in every direction to help in making the city and community better. Many organizations of boys and girls are to be found in the church. They have regular meetings and socials.

The outlook for the Federated Churches has never been better.

The Numbering of the Nation in 1920

WE ARE going to be counted again. The great human hive called the United States and all the big human hives under the Stars and ipes are to be probed statistically.

his is a big job. Because it is so big, it is done but e in ten years. It has been performed only thir- n times in the history of the United States.

he first time was in 1790 under the supervision of President, George Washington. The work cov- d the thirteen original colonies and four others not admitted in the Union, Vermont, Kentucky, nnessee and Maine. There were not quite four lion people in the whole United States then—less n half the population today of the single state of w York or of Pennsylvania. Virginia, with 747,610 ple, was the most populous state, a position ich she proudly maintained until the fourth census, en New York put her in second place.

he Secretary of State conducted the work of ing the census in 1810, 1820, 1830 and 1840. At sixth census, 1840, there were 17,069,453 people merated in thirty states, Iowa and Wisconsin being nted for the first time, and New York state, with er two and a half million population, presenting biggest portion of the job.

he newly organized Department of the Interior was en the work of counting the 23,191,876 people in rty-six states for the seventh census, 0. The six new states were Cali- nia, Minnesota, New Mexico, egon, Texas, and Utah.

The work of the thirteenth census, 10, was done under the supervision the United States Department of mmerce and Labor; and now it volves upon the Department of mmerce to conduct the fourteenth nsus, 1920.

Great changes have been made ce the first census of 1790, provided r by the Constitution of the new ited States. From the simple unting of noses by local authorities ely performing the task, the taking the census has developed into a great, expertly systematized, tabulated achievement.

The work of census-taking has been shorn of many special inquiries which had been grafted on it from decade to decade. Among these are the queries as to the indebtedness on farms and homes, as to the defective, dependent and delinquent; and many other investigations such as education, Indians, etc., now regularly covered by other established bureaus of the Federal Government, or now summed up by special agents in special reports issued each year by the Census Bureau people.

Greater speed has been acquired, too, by increasing the number of supervisors' districts and subdivisions to conform, as far as possible, to the boundaries of Congressional districts; and the provision of electric tabulating machines which help in classifying statistics accurately and rapidly.

The chief work of the census, the listing, is done by an army of enumerators mobilized for service in every state. The number of the counting-forces has increased with the population. Nearly 100,000 enumerators and clerks are needed for the fourteenth census—an increase of 35,000 over the number employed in 1910. The enumerators were required to work ten hours a day in 1900, but in the act providing for the thirteenth census the time was changed to eight hours. The enumerators will be engaged from two to five weeks, beginning April, 1920, in getting and recording the data called for by the census inquiries relating to population and agriculture.

It has been suggested that the position of enumerator be made one of honor, and that the men and women serve without pay, as is done in some European countries, a medal of honor being given to those who serve well and faithfully. The director of the last census although paying $3 or more a day, was able to get many to serve more because of interest in the work than for the compensation involved. Many students in colleges and universities, school teachers, and crop report correspondents of the Department of Agriculture serve as enumerators. They ask twenty-nine questions of every individual and corporation. In addition to the enumerators, more than 2,000 special agents are employed for a longer period in collecting the data of manufactures, mines, quarries, forests and forest products.

The clerical and subclerical force numbers at its maximum 5,000, chosen through open competitive examinations held by the United States Civil Service Commission, the merit system being even more vigorously applied in the census act of 1919 than heretofore; and a new provision is made for an advisory committee on the census representing the American Economic and American Statistical Associations. Census director Dr. Samuel L. Rogers has in this committee included Dr. Walter F. Willcox, of Cornell University heading the department of methods and results; Dr. E. R. A. Seligman of Columbia University; Professor C. W. Doten, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; Professor W. C. Mitchell, Columbia University; former Chief Clerk of the Census Bureau, W. S. Rossiter; and Dean E. F. Gay of Harvard Business School and the Central Bureau of Planning and Statistics at Washington, D. C.

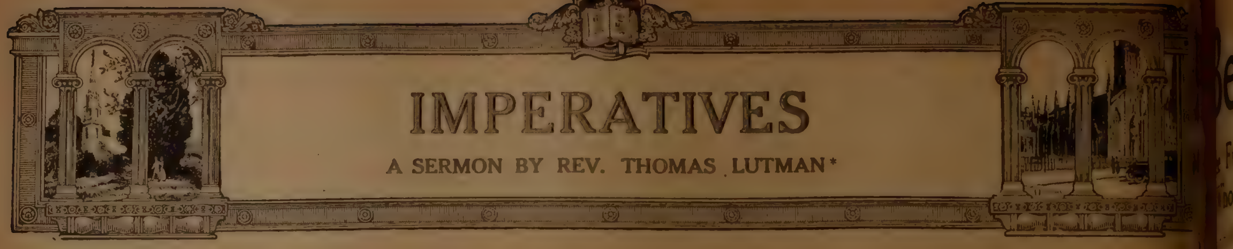
OF VALUES



IMPERATIVES

A SERMON BY REV. THOMAS LUTMAN*

TEXT—Eph. 6 : 20. "I ought." Phil. 4 : 13. "I can." Luke 15 : 18. "I will." II Tim. 4 : 7. "I have."

"I OUGHT." In the Tate gallery is a remarkable picture entitled "The Dweller in the Innermost." The figure represents Conscience with blazing eyes, a star upon her forehead; in her lap arrows before which no excuse or pretense can stand. The picture burns one truth upon the student. In the soul of man is a light which blazes the supreme imperative—"I ought."

God has not left himself without a witness. The light of the great imperative is in every soul. Christians are not people who do as they like, but who do as they ought. Religion is knowing what you ought to do and doing it. The darkest word is sin; the meanest word is hypocrisy; the shortest word is time; the longest word is eternity; the most solemn word is conscience—"I ought."

You ought to live and serve your brother, your country, your God. Livingstone said: "To leave my motherless children and go to Africa is like tearing the vitals out of me, but I ought to go"—and he went.

When you say "I ought" you are in good company. A sense of necessity was ever upon the Carpenter of Nazareth. He was not ashamed to acknowledge it: his earliest and last and master word was "ought." From that word he made no appeal. Its echo is in every great epoch of his life. "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" "Ought" drew him out of quiet Galilee to the crowded streets of busy Jerusalem, to the olives of dark Gethsemane, and to the highest hill in all the world—Calvary.

"I CAN." God can do nothing with the man who says "I can't." He can do anything with the man who says "I can." The greatest day in your spiritual history is when you say "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." There is nothing you ought to do that you can't do. You can be what you ought to be.

"I can't pray." You can. "I can't be pious." Try it. "I can't teach that class." You can. "I am so weak." "When I am weak then I am strong." You can grip the hand of God and refuse to let him go until he bless you.

His friends say that when the driver lay on his dying bed he cried in the delirium of fever, "I am on the down grade and I can't reach the brakes." Many a man is falling down the abyss of wretchedness crying, "I can't reach the brakes!" You can; you can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth you.

A single butterfly can make its way against the breezes over land and sea, from distant Africa to England. How much better is a man than a butterfly?

I think of Prescott, blind, groping his way across the hall at Harvard, but becoming a master of languages, ancient and modern, and a great historian. I think of Parkman, his health ruined, lame, but making his life count for God and humanity. I think of Christ; he matched himself against the religious hierarchy of his day; pitted himself against the Roman empire; against oppression, slavery, the sweat shop, the slum and the brothel, and said: "I can overcome them!"

"I can" bridged Niagara, built Chicago on the Illinois prairie, belted the world with cable and steam, and will yet win the world for Jesus.

That was a great day in the history of the race when the first man looked at the winds and sun and said, "I can tame them and make them paint my picture and drive my boat." When he looked at himself and said: "I can say to the impulse, 'come,' and it comes; and to that feeling, 'go,' and it goes." The Germans say that the man who can is koenig—king. Crowned or uncrowned, if you can you are a king. God never made a nobody. You are not a nobody, you are a somebody. You are a son of God—and it doth not yet appear what you shall be.

What is the greatest power in the world? The lightning that crumbles the tower and solid masonry? The earthquake that overturns the skyscraper like a house of cards? The sea that batters great ships to pieces and pounds away the rocky coast-line? The greatest power in the world is the human will; next to the omnipotence of God is the will of man.

All human achievement hinges on the will. Character and destiny are pivoted on the will; you will be what you will to be. The strength of the bridge is its girders; the strength of life is its will. You are not responsible for your circumstances; you are responsible how you act toward your circumstances. That is will. The difference between the groveling animal and man is will. God hangs the earth upon nothing. He hangs human destiny upon the will. God can guide the star in its orbit. He can't guide man until man wills to let him. God can't help a man if that man won't let him. God won't have a mechanical morality. He won't break down the will. "Wilt thou be made whole?" "Ye will not come to me." "O Jerusalem, how often would I, and ye would not!"

"I WILL." The sublimest spectacle that the angels of God ever see is that of a man who finds himself stealthily mastered by evil habit, and swears for the sake of his manhood and little children, "I will master it." What an hour! They clinch and grapple; habit weakens and wavers and falls; the man puts his heel upon its neck and says, "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory."

The banquet is spread. The table is groaning with the good things of God. God can bring you to the table— He can't force you to eat. The doors of the great Father's house are swinging wide. The lights are burning for whosoever will.

When Moody reached the climax of his marvelous sermons he would say, "Let those who want to come forward say 'I will.'" From all parts of the crowded hall broken voices cried, "I will! I will!"

The prodigal bitten with remorse might have lived and died in the swine-field, but he said, "I ought," "I can," "I will" go home to God. The climax of human blessedness is a will at one with the will of God. "I have come to do the will of my Father." "Not my will but thine be done." "My meat and drink is to do the will of Him that sent me."

You will never be a Christian until you say "I will." You have two creators, God and your own will. Life is an unshapen block of marble; you may shape it into what you choose. Life is a canvas—you make it into a masterpiece or a daub.

Lincoln says that he was one of the weakest of men. He would go where any one asked him to go; he would drink when anyone asked him to drink. "I am going to get a will," he said. How did it begin? He was going home and he was hungry, he had left his work and was running. "Now," he said, "you are being driven by your body to your dinner. Why not turn square about and go back and work until supper time?" He did!

He was invited to a party made up of a number of friends, and felt inclined to go, but he was obliged to leave undone a piece of work which he felt must be completed. He sent a letter of apology and went back to his work.

That is not foolish. It is great. It was the discipline that made the great rugged soul of the railsplitter.

The finest kit of tools in the world is useless without the driving and cooperating power of the hand. The soul is the best kit of tools in all the world. Your will is your hand; the tools are useless until they are driven by the hand.

Here are two automobiles going up an incline. One puffs and stops half-way; the other clears the hill. What is the difference? Engine power—your will is your engine.

Here are two ships passing through the Cape Cod Canal. One is a small tug puffing and snorting but dragging a 150-foot schooner behind. What is the difference between the ships? The difference is an engine—the difference between men is engine power—

Thy Will Be Done

CHOOSE thou for me; I dare not choose,
  Lest, should I ask to hold this life

And in thy will its finite wish

The while I humbly wait, Until Eternity unfold thine infinite behest.

"In every manufacturing industry the story is the same. Hundreds come into the field but dominance comes to only one or two firms. Why? Not because of manufacturing advantages, for these soon become standardized. Not through financial resources, for capital competes for employment in fields where profits can be demonstrated.

"The difference—the vital factor in each case—is Sales Management."

White Garments in Sardis

SUNDAY. Rev. 3 : 4. "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments, and they shall walk with me in white." White garments in Sardis! And Sardis abounded in corruption. Only yesterday I saw a white flower unfurling its pure lovely petals like white banners in the sheltering defenses of a conservatory, and even in that guarded refuge the whiteness was exceedingly wonderful. To see holiness in some monastic retreat is one thing; to see it in the great trade thoroughfares is quite another. It is a wonderful thing to see the white robe in Sardis.

And yet we can see this wonder every day if we will only open our eyes. I have seen a young lovely girl unfolding a Christlike holiness in the home of a drunkard. There are multitudes of men in business life whose garments are undefiled. Their purity begins in the soul. They are as busy as anybody else in the ways of labor, but their citizenship is in heaven. Whenever we see the white garments in Sardis we see something of the Holy City, the New Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God.

Now it is men and women of this kind who are the most powerful and arresting witnesses for the Lord. White is always very striking, but never more so than when it is the white flower of a blameless life. When it reveals itself in a workshop, or in an office, or in a club, it captivates and captures all who are near.

"Who are these that are arrayed in white robes, and whence came they? These are they who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Their lives have been washed in the sacrificial love and grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. Only Christ can make them clean. "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

North Winds and South

MONDAY. Song of Sol. 4 : 16. "Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south; flow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out." In Jerusalem the north winds are from the highlands and the mountains Hermon, Tabor and the Lebanons. The south winds are warm and are from Arabia. He who wrote these words of gardens probably looked out through his palace window upon a king's garden. History says little of Solomon's gardens, and it is strange, for he was a lover of plants. But they must have been very beautiful. Let the wind blow over a garden full of flowers and the air for miles is saturated with the odor of orange and oleander, lilacs and lilies, hyacinths and lotus. These are the spices that flow out. But this garden is not a king's garden, not Solomon's, but the garden of our souls. These winds are not the winds that blow from Lebanon or from Egypt, but the winds of changing circumstance, the stiff north wind that stirs us up, and the soft south wind that quiets us. And these spices are not odors, but qualities of the soul, spiritual influences which have their source in our lives, and which affect others, whether we know it or not.

Life is not all north wind, but if it were, it need not all be bleak and black. Life is not all south wind, but if it were, it were not all ease. The northern races have their soft side, their fancies and their festivals. The southern races have developed some hardy heroes. Life is neither forest nor jungle; neither iceberg nor desert; it is both. The north wind and the south wind represent life's exciting moments, the one of hardship and suffering, the other of fortune and of ease. The Christian soul welcomes both. What, welcome the north wind? Yes. It is the north wind that "hurls us from change to change." So the north winds are God's winds, even as are the south winds. What spices reach us from the gardens of life upon which rude winds have blown! It is a debatable question whether we do not owe more to adversity than to prosperity. Certainly the world owes much to the calamities of its children, much of its sweetness, its music and its truth. It requires the north winds to blow upon the gardens of genius and of character that the spices thereof may flow out.

Many Members with One Head

TUESDAY. I Cor. 12 : 20. "Now they are many members, but one body." In one small town you may see today many churches and chapels, each separate from the other. But in apostolic times the Christians, though scattered abroad by persecution, remained one family. Paul would travel a thousand miles gathering money from wealthy communities like Philippi for distribution in Judea, where already the nemesis of the crucifixion, culminating in the ruin of Jerusalem, was casting the shadow of poverty over the people.

What drew that ever-widening circle together was not the pressure of creeds and rubrics on the circumference, but the attraction of Him who was the Center. Yet there was much variety of teaching. While Paul insisted on justification by faith, James held that faith without works is dead. Both views were right, but clearly here was every chance of a split. Again Paul differed sharply from Barnabas over John Mark, and every one knew it—there was no attempt to conceal the trouble—but the church at Cyprus, where Barnabas labored, remained none the less a normal Christian communion, without adjective or qualification; and it was Paul who, years later, begged that John Mark might relieve his loneliness with Luke in Rome because he was profitable in the ministry. Over questions like eating with Gentiles, Paul withstood Peter at Antioch, because he was to be blamed; yet Peter was the apostle who, in his letters to the faithful, insisted that Paul's writings, though sometimes hard to understand, were truly inspired.

These men had to solve problems of great delicacy, like the election of an apostle or the apportionment of money between Grecian and Hebrew widows; but through it all they managed to be "of one mind."

The Body of Christ was one; he alone was the head, and the rest were members one of another. P. W. W.

The Charge

WEDNESDAY. Luke 19 : 13. "Occupy till I come." Jesus, like the nobleman in the parable of the pounds, has gone to the far country. He is coming again in all his glory to sit upon the throne of his universal kingdom. At his second coming he will wear a crown of glory instead of thorns, will have a scepter of victory instead of defeat. He will be living forever more instead of dying on Calvary. Christ's second coming does not mean at death, for in dying we go to him. It does not mean the coming of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. His mission is separate and distinct from that of our Lord's. It is not for us to know the times or seasons of his coming, but to do his will, work his vineyard, serve his Church, to "occupy till he come."

We must use the talents given us for his glory, be watchful, be ready, be waiting; not as stargazers, but as vigilant, devoted workmen. A busy woman, doing her housework, said to Mr. Spurgeon, her pastor, "If I had known you were coming, I would have been ready." He replied, "You could not have been in better readiness than in faithfully doing your work as a housewife. When the Lord Jesus comes suddenly, I hope he will find me doing as you are doing, fulfilling the duty of the hour." Is not service the great word of the age today? Social service, Christian service, church service, labor service, soul-saving service, all such workers are occupying, busily waiting for the coming of the Lord, who will reward his servants and establish his throne in the earth. E. W. C.

Watch, Pray, Work

THURSDAY. Matt. 24 : 32. "Now learn a parable of the fig tree." The practical question is, What should we as Christians be doing? The Lord's answer is clear.

First, we are to watch. How that word "watch!" rings through the teachings of Jesus! How like a beacon it shines on the heights!

Second, we are to pray. There was never a time for such emphasis on the Lord's injunction as now. "When ye pray say, Thy Kingdom come." The coming of his Kingdom means the reign of universal peace. Swords shall be beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks, and the hymn of hate will give way to the angels' song, "Peace on earth and good will to men." The tabernacle of God shall come down among men, and they shall be his people and he shall be their God.

Third, we are to lend a hand. Our watching is not to be like theirs who look out of the windows or stand in the market place with folded hands, but as husbandmen with sickles keen for the harvesting. Instead of gazing up into heaven we are to go out into the highways and hedges and constrain men to come in. "Blessed is the servant whom the Lord when he cometh shall find so doing."

Then shall the Prince of Peace take up his abode in this war-stained world. The desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands before him, while those who love his appearing cry, "Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and the King of Glory shall come in!"

A Seven-Story Buildiug

FRIDAY. II Peter 1 : 5-7. "Besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity." Life is like a building and nothing but the best of material should be used in it. After the rubbish is cleared away, the first thing to do is to lay the foundation, which here Peter calls Faith. The deeper we go down for foundation, the higher we can go up the building. Faith is God's foundat for character and his medium of vation.

The first floor in this building Pe speaks of as Virtue, better known to as Courage—a courage which ke us loyal to our faith and true to convictions. The war taught us t courage was not confined to any nation, and we know that courage not confined to any one person. life today should be keyed to the her

The next story in our building Knowledge. God is a God of reason well as revelation. He never places premium on ignorance, but rather vites us, saying, "Come, let us rea together." Knowledge is power, a brain is still the directing force.

The next story is Temperanc better translated self-control. This i great apartment in which to live, it makes for the happiness of one's and all others. It means control of te per, tongue, thought, will and emotio

The next story in our building Patience. If we have that, then can have anything.

On top of patience we must Godliness, which is nothing more less than God-likeness. This is rea the destiny of man and should be t ambition of all.

The last story is Brotherly Ki ness—located, of course, next to Go liness as it should be.

The Autumn of Life

SATURDAY. Ps. 71 : 9. "Cast not off in the time of old age." aged father who had struck an oil w on his poor little farm in Texas decid to test the devotion of his daughter a son-in-law. One day he came to the clothed in the rags he used to wear a said, "Your old father wants you care for him the rest of his life. He ca not work any longer." The daught replied, "We have but little in o home, but we will divide with yo dear father." Then the old man proud exclaimed, "My dear children, you sh henceforth reside in a mansion in Pit burg which I have bought for you; y shall ride in an automobile and enj the luxuries of wealth."

It is natural for loving, devot children to be kind to aged parent but estrangements have often occurr when the old and feeble have be pushed aside, crowded out, made feel that they are not wanted.

Every drop of blood in a parent heart throbs with affection for t child. They are willing to suffer for t training and happiness of those dear to them than life. How cruel, therefor when the child forgets the love and ca manifested through all its early day

Balzac, in his "Père Goriot," pu these words in the father's mouth he is passing away: "Not until you a dying do you know your children. gave them life, they are giving me th deathblow. If I had not given them a my wealth, they would be with me no at my bedside. My children are to turing me for the sin of affection."

What a contrast to this is witnesse in many homes! When the aged repos in the family of their dear ones, eve realizing that they are loved and wanted their last days become their best days Then they can say, "Age is sweeter tha youth, as the harvest time is more golden than seed time, the ending brighter than the beginning." Why Children Don't Obey Obedience is the very foundation of character in all children. Yet how many parents discover constantly that their instructions to their children carry no farther than around the corner. And disobedience is simply the leader of a whole troop of bad traits. Wilfulness, selfishness, jealousy, disrespect, untruthfulness, ill temper and many other harmful, unpleasant qualities that a child acquires during the first few years of its life are directly related to that first great fault of disobedience.

New Methods for Old

Until now, scolding and whipping seem to have been about the only resource at the command of parents. But new methods have been discovered which make it easy to train children to obey promptly, pleasantly and surely without breaking the child's will, without creating fear, resentment or revenge in the child's heart, as whipping does. This new method is based on confidence between parent and child. When perfect understanding and sympathy exist, obedience comes naturally and all the bad traits that children pick up so easily are not given a chance to develop. A command, quietly spoken, brings instant obedience in every case!—and even children who are habitually disobedient are quickly changed into willing, obedient boys and girls.

Do You Know How—

- to instruct children in the delicate matter of sex?
- to always obtain cheerful obedience?
- to correct mistakes of early training?
- to keep child from crying?
- to develop initiative in child?
- to teach child instantly to comply with command, "Don't touch"?
- to suppress temper in children without punishment?
- to teach punctuality? Perseverance? Carefulness?
- to overcome obstinacy?

These are only a few of the hundreds of questions fully answered and explained.

YOUR WORLD

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE sunlight touches the vivid waves that dance on the autumn sea and, sitting here on the shore, I feel that the world was made for me. Sitting here on the shore alone, I watch the place where the sky kisses the water far away and my heart is lifted high—lifted high as the smiling clouds that gentle as soft songs float through the turquoise sky of the autumn day. . . . Far off a little boat is sailing in from some misty shore and I wonder what it brings, for its hull is bright with the sun's warm light and its sails are glad as wings. Maybe it comes from some foreign place with stones that are uncut fire; maybe it brings from a promised land the jewels of a heart's desire; maybe it carries a weight of hope and a cargo of faith and prayer. . . . I sit alone on the sandy beach and the gay wind plays with my hair.

The world is mine—it is mine to hold—it is mine while my life shall be. I know it now as I sit and watch the glow of the dancing sea. I know that each bit of sun is mine—I know that each vivid wave is part of my heritage, I know that the One who made them gave their beauty into my hands; my soul is thrilled at the thought that I am the one who owns, through the will of God, this vision of sea and sky.

You know the feeling yourselves—you've seen the smile of the Master's face in a mountain gorge or a rippled lake or a wind-swept prairie place. You've seen the love in his tender gaze and you've felt the touch of his hand when the dawn swept up in a wistful haze or the sunset lay on the land. You've felt his nearness in silent woods when the trees rose tall in their pride, and you've seen his light in the stars' faint shine that silvered a dark hillside. You know the feeling—half awe it is, half awe at an unguessed love—and half a spirit that bids you reach to the heights that loom above.

The world is yours; it is yours to own; it is yours as a splendid home—a home that is never cast away, no matter how far you roam. The world is yours as a glowing trust that your hands may break or hold—the world is yours, it is in your soul, and it may be lead—or gold!

SOME people look at the world, and laugh in its face, and say: "This world is built for my fun alone—I will joke at life, and play! I will play through all of the summer months and romp through the winter's cold. For life is short and the world is mine—and the heart so soon grows old!"

These people play with never a thought for the sober things of life. And the world that is theirs rolls sadly on with its pain and want and strife. They play through the days and into the nights with nothing to do but live. They take their all from the world's kind hands—they take, but they never give.

And others go with a frowning mien through the world, and never a smile can touch their lips, for they groan and say, "We live such a little while that we mustn't laugh, and we mustn't play, and we mustn't stop to see the flowers growing beside the way. The bird in the tall oak tree is wasting his time—for he sings and sings, while we must toil for our bread! I wonder that birds are given wings!" They walk with a down-bent head through the wealth of color and light and love that is set for their very eyes—they walk with never an upward glance and the world looks on, and sighs. Ah, they worry on through the happy years, half-wondering what they lack; and they take the light from the laughing world, and they give no sunshine back!

But there are folks who live in the world in the way that God has planned—folks who live by the Golden Rule—the rule of the helping hand. They do their work with a singing soul in the way that they know is best. And then when their work for the time is through they play in the world, and rest. They joke a bit and they laugh a bit, and they smile in a stranger's eyes; they see the beauty that God has made for his children that are wise in the better things of life, they know when another's road is steep that they must help—and when darkness comes they sleep with the healthy sleep of those who are clear of conscience, they are the ones who really live—for they take the best from the willing world and they have the best to give!

Giving—that is the answer made by the earth and the sky and sea. Giving—that is God's word to us—for he makes no mystery of the fact that the earth and the sea and sky have been given us for our own; his is the law that says, "If one ask for bread, will ye give a stone?" And so in his bounty he has made us free in a world of light. And our task it is that the world be kept as he gave it, pure and bright. Our task it is that we meet our lives in the better, surer way—that we look at the world as a place to give—with a space for work and play. Not as a playground—all the time—and not as a place of toil with the play left out—but a place of friends, where friendship, alone, is royal! And as season comes and as season goes the law is ever the same—the winter time with its whirl of snows, and the summer with skies aflame; the spring with its blossom-covered boughs, and its pale enchanted days, and the autumn time when the dreamy hills are veiled in a purple haze. Beauty is ours though the seasons four and the world is warm in our hands; we stand at a widely opened door that leads to enchanted lands!

THE sunlight touches the vivid waves that dance on the autumn sea. And sitting here on the shore, I feel that the world was made for me. Sitting here on the shore, alone, I watch the place where the sky kisses the water far away, and my heart is lifted high.

For the world is mine—it is all my own; it is mine while my life shall be. I know it now, for the God above has made no mystery of the fact that the earth that stretches far on every side in the sun, is a wonder-place—and it is mine, and my life is just begun!

You know the feeling—I know you do—you've looked at the Master's face in a mountain gorge, or a rippled lake, or a wind-swept prairie place! You've seen the love in his tender gaze and you've felt the touch of his hand when the dawn swept up in a rosy haze—or the sunset lay on the land!

Quaint Names for Converts

REV. HAROLD COOPER, of the Madura Mission, India, sends this interesting account of a village baptism involving changes of names that recall some of those found in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." Mr. Cooper writes:

"As a rule, conversions in the villages are among outcastes, and they are sometimes converted in large numbers. A few Sundays ago, I was called to a village where one of our evangelists is working. It was the occasion of the baptism of new converts, and these converts actually filled the little church. There were fifty-one men, women and children, and it was a memorable sight to see the pastor baptizing them.

"It is the custom here to give converts new names, and there were some surprises in this connection. For example, Mrs. She-Devil was changed to Mrs. Happiness. That is a literal translation of the name she had and the name given. Other names were very suggestive. Here are some of them:

"Mrs. Whitewoman to Mrs. Bell of Religion.

"Mr. Man of a Fort to Mr. Child of the Church.

"Mr. Nose Pricked to Mr. Servant of Jesus.

"Mr. Heathen God to Mr. Blessing.

"Mr. Blackman to Mr. Eye of Wisdom.

"Mr. Worm to Mr. Fulness.

"Mr. Beggar to Mr. Child of the Temple."

The Kindergarten

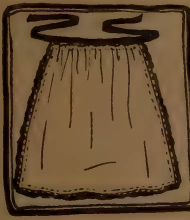
IE kindergarten is more than a particular form of school. It is essential principle of education— principle that education is growth manufacture. The kindergarten child garden; the home and the ol are the soil; bad habits are the ds; the parents and the teachers are gardeners; education is preparing enriching the soil, planting the ls, weeding the garden bed; the dergarten plays and songs are garden ; a cheerful spirit, a genial humor, irit of kindness and sympathy are necessary sunshine; sorrows, trials, ptations, tears, discipline are the essary rain. Every home and every ool should be a child garden, in which growing youth should be guided his growth but always encouraged grow naturally, simply, healthfully whatever flower and fruit his nature him for.

we will plant the children of our nigrants in American soil, give them erican companions, teach them in American language, let them breathe erican literature, discipline them in American art of self-government, warm their hearts in the sunshine of American tenderness, sympathy, and good-fellowship, and always respect the nature which God has given them however it may differ from ours, they will grow up loyal, patriotic, devoted Americans. DR. LYMAN ABBOTT.

An Apron for the Little Girl

VERY little material is required to make an apron for the girl in short dresses. Any little girl may make herself a pretty and reasonable apron out of one of father's old handkerchiefs.

Gather one side of the handkerchief and sew it to the center portion of a piece of ribbon which is long enough to tie around the waist. Then "overhand" some lace on the three other sides of the handkerchief (see illustration).



The Banana

THIS is the season of the banana. The best season for oranges has passed, the grapefruit has had its triumph in the months we have been through, and apples are on the decline as compared with their availability in autumn and winter.

The banana is most desirable as a foodstuff in the diet. Frequent mention is made of the fact that it is hard to digest. There is no reason for this complaint, however, for in the majority of instances, if the fruit is thoroughly ripe or if it is cooked, no difficulty in digestion will be experienced. A thoroughly ripened banana has a characteristic flavor and odor. The starch has been changed to a more easily digested form, so that, when ripe, the banana has neither the same flavor nor composition as it has when green. Brown spots on the skin indicate the stage of ripeness. If the skin is unbroken and decay has not begun, a banana with a brown skin is preferable, from the standpoint of a food material, to the yellow or greenish-yellow one which the majority of people buy. If there are no signs of decomposition, the dark spots are not objectionable.

If the unripe banana is baked, it is as wholesome as the thoroughly ripened one eaten raw. In either case, precaution must be taken to masticate thoroughly. As the fruit is soft and has a tendency to slip down the throat easily, it is apt to be not well masticated; wherefore the digestive difficulties.

The many ways in which a banana may be served make it adaptable for any or all of the three meals. As a fruit it may be served alone or in combination with other fruits in the form of a salad or dessert; when cooked, it may be served in the form of a vegetable; as a part of the breakfast menu, it may be served simply with salt, with cream and sugar, with cereal or with fruit juice.

Suggestions

For the school lunch box: Brown bread with cottage cheese sandwiches, plain sandwiches, sponge cake, baked apple, milk.

Washing silks requires great care. A soap solution should be used instead of rubbing the soap directly on the cloth. Washing powders or soda should never be used.

In removing spots from clothing place a cloth pad or piece of blotting paper underneath the stain; this will absorb the stain and the surplus cleaning agent.

United States has abandoned the "open door" policy and has acquiesced in the "paramount interest" idea, which Mr. Lansing specifically excluded from the agreement. Japan-controlled newspapers and magazines in the Orient, as clippings forwarded to Washington show, actively spread this idea.

Action Against "Cement Trust"

AT THE direction of Attorney General Palmer, an action in equity was begun on August 13 in the United States courts in New Jersey against nineteen of the largest manufacturers of Portland cement. The manufacturers are accused of entering into agreements which have doubled and trebled the price of cement. The suit is one angle of the government's efforts to reduce the cost of living. The petition cites the fact that cement enters into almost every character of building work, and the prevailing prices place "a heavy burden on the public." In addition to arbitrarily increasing prices, the government charges that production was reduced from 50,000,000 barrels a year in 1915 to 23,000,000 barrels in 1918, or 27,000,000 barrels less than the capacity of the mills. Alleged conspiracy is the principal basis for the action.

A Threat Against Mexico

THE State Department has made public a note addressed to the Mexican government on July 22, and the Mexican answer dated July 28. The United States warned Carranza that "should the lives of American citizens continue to remain unsafe . . . by means of the unwillingness or inability of the Mexican government to afford adequate protection, my government may be forced to adopt a radical change in its policy with regard to Mexico." The tone adopted in the note was the strongest used toward the neighboring republic since the exchange that preceded the occupation of Vera Cruz. Another serious complication in the relations of the two states arose with the capture by Mexican bandits of two American army aviators, Lieutenants Peterson and Davis, who were forced to land below the border. After a week a message came from the captors that the aviators would be killed unless a ransom of $15,000 was immediately forthcoming. The money was quickly obtained in El Paso.

Armenia in Danger

MAJOR GENERAL JAMES G. HARBORD, with a staff of more than forty experts, is in Armenia on orders from President Wilson to conduct a thorough investigation of the economic and military problems in that country. He will return to Paris about October 1 with a report which is expected to guide the American government in any decision it makes regarding an American mandate over the Armenians. Disquieting reports reach Paris and Washington daily on the situation in the Caucasus with the withdrawal of two British divisions which have been policing the region.

The Fight Against High Prices

A SYSTEMATIC campaign against food wholesalers who have excess stocks in cold storage has resulted in the confiscation of enormous supplies of eggs, butter, coffee, sugar and other staples. Seizures are being made on libel information issued by the Department of Justice, and the stocks held at the disposal of the courts. Seizures have been made in a large number of cities, and the activity, the government says, will continue until hoarding in storage warehouses is brought to an end. Congress has under consideration many measures looking to the reduction of prices, but most of the proposals are for money with which to conduct inquiries into special phases of the economic situation. A bill embodying recommendations made by the President to Congress has been submitted by Attorney General Palmer. Strong opposition to it has arisen, however, especially among Southern Democrats. Objection largely centers in the effort to extend the provisions of the Level Food Control Law to apply to peace conditions. Members of both Houses denounce it as "socialism," and as an effort by the government "to meddle in business."

The government has definitely abandoned its plan to force down the price of wheat by the use of a billion-dollar fund provided to guarantee $2.26 a bushel to the farmers.

RELIGIOUS

Men Seek the Ministry. Reports from the theological seminaries indicate that the dearth of students so noticeable during the last few years will be ended. The outlook is better than had been expected. The Baptists, whose Five Year Movement included a drive for ministerial and missionary volunteers, and the Methodists, whose Centenary Movement was planned to inspire to personal consecration as well as giving, are both enrolling largely increased numbers in their schools. But all denominational schools, and schools not strictly denominational, are rejoicing in increased numbers of earnest men seeking preparation for the ministry and for missionary service.

To Combat "Isms." Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, Congregational and Episcopal ministers, laymen and laywomen in southern California have organized the Christian Truth Society to arrange, for this winter, a system of forums and addresses from pulpits and platforms and through the press, designed to promote a general understanding of orthodox Christian teaching and to combat various "isms."

Dr. Gray at Conferences. Dr. James M. Gray, of the Moody Bible Institute, presided and delivered addresses at the Bible Conference at Castine, Me., August 24-31, and was expected to repeat the addresses at the Conference at Camden, Me., August 31 to September 7. Evangelist Henry Ostrom of Greencastle, Ind., also addressed both conferences. Dr. Gray discussed the League of Nations, Prophecy, Church Union and the Work of the Ministry. Dr. Ostrom gave a series of addresses on Prayer.

For Girls in Africa. The Women's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church is developing a girls' school at Mutumbara, Rhodesia, South Africa, in connection with an industrial and evangelistic mission of the M. E. Board of Missions. At the end of the first six months a nucleus of twenty-eight girls had been gathered, all of whom were Christians.

To Restore the Restoration. Members of the Disciples of Christ, who are alarmed over the tendency toward Federation, Unity and liberalism in non-essentials, and also over the tendency of their own members to forget the call to New Testament faith and practice which the movement was originally designed to restore, are developing with increasing interest plans for a great congress in Cincinnati to meet in October just before the National Congress of Disciples, "to make the world ring again with the New Testament message."

World Conference of Churches. The Protestant Episcopal World Conference Commission announced on August 14 that many Church communions in Europe, Asia Minor and Africa had accepted the invitation to participate in the World Conference on Faith and Order. Some of the churches to be represented are the Greek Church, Orthodox synods, in Turkey, Bulgaria, Rumania, Serbia, Egypt, Abyssinia and Palestine, the Church of Sweden, the Church of Norway, and the Church of England. Among the American churches delegates are expected from the Protestant Episcopal, Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Presbyterian, Friends and Moravian churches.

merry; maybe the train had started him. He was full of trills and a melting sort of laughter that went through you. He was like some devil who knew our trouble, Mary's and mine, and pointed fingers at us and made a joke of it. I was boiling, I shook my fist at the sound.

"You—you old fool!" I said to him. "Shut up!"

Deep in his throat he made a sound like more laughter.

And Mary was white in the morning; her eyes were tired. I hung about the kitchen, hoping she would let me sit there and talk to her and fetch water when she needed it and help her forget; but she made one errand after another for me that kept me away; none of them came to anything. She sent me over to Mrs. Stedman's to see if there was a match for some pink thread she had. Then to the Rutledge place with a present of jelly. And after dinner she wanted me to go to the ball game over at Mapleton.

"I'd rather stay here with you," says I, wanting terribly to let her know that I understood and was sorry. And she smiled; the blue of her eyes was deeper than ever.

Zack . . . Zachary Taylor Burns, what are all the pearls and crowns in the world to a girl like my Mary; so sweet?

There was something in the sun of the afternoon that made things somehow better. It was bright and very hot, and made you lazy and peaceful like. I sat on the front porch wondering what to do, and glad to my soul that school was over. Little clouds like suds, all colors, hung at the edges of the sky and made me think of fishing. Mary looked out at me once and smiled, dreary-like; the pink was gone from her face. But she smiled . . .

I wished there was something I could do to help, some prayer I could say . . . I lifted my face to the highest blue, where no clouds were . . . And then I heard the call from the road, from the little darky who hung around the railroad station pointing out the hotel, to call it that, and running errands for the station boss, and carrying telegrams. . . . He waved a yellow envelope at me.

"Cummere, Mist' Herbert," says he. "Telemgram for Miss Ma'y."

I was at the gate in two shakes.

"Who sent it?" I asked. "What's in it?"

"How come I know?" says he, peevish like; he showed me where to sign and was gone. And there I was with the thing in my hand, all swelled up; the blood was hot in me; and I ran to the house, calling Mary.

She came out with a scared sort of look when she saw the telegram, and took it from me very slow.

"Oh, Herb!" says she, "Oh, I'm afraid! . . . Aunt Bessie may . . . "

For a little while she looked at me, her eyes wide. Something heavy was at my heart. A hen, pecking on the path, hopped to the lowest step and then to the porch, we were so still. Mary ripped the envelope.

"Oh, Herb!" She was on her knees, she hugged me.

Oh, more trouble? . . .

Then I saw it:

"Bought the yarbrough farm this morning genesis twenty nine twenty."

Zack, in Montgomery! We hadn't thought of Zack!

"What's he mean, Mary?" said I.

"He means—Oh, Herb! . . . "And there she was crying, that big girl. "Run, honey, and get the Bible!"

At that I remembered something. "The Bible!" said I. "Oh, Genesis! Oh, I know!"

And I told her, like Zack had told me: "And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her."

It couldn't have been anything else, after what I knew; and sure enough, when I got the Bible it wasn't.

FIRE CHIEF
FIRE

YOU don't have to use Effecto Red Enamel on your car, like Fire Chief W. H. Joynes, of Richmond, Va., did, if you like any of the other eight colors better! Any one of them will make your old Frivolous Four look like a Sensible Six!

Effecto AUTO FINISHES

If you own a six, eight or twelve you are fond of, don't let that stop you. Neal McAuliffe, a chauffeur of Allston, Mass., applied Effecto on a Cadillac Eight in a public garage. He and the owner were so well pleased with the result that he rejuvenated a Marmon in the same way.

You too can apply one or two coats of Effecto and drive out what appears to be a new car, in 24 to 48 hours! And this finish will outwear the finish on most new cars!

Effecto is the genuine, original high lustre auto enamel; quick-drying, easy-working and self-leveling; not a wax, polish or paint. Do not confuse it with some of the renamed buggy paints on the market. You'll see the difference as soon as you try it.

In addition to the nine lustrous enamel colors there are Effecto Finishing (clear varnish) and Top & Seat Dressing, which renews and waterproofs all kinds of tops, seats and upholstery. Dries in fifteen minutes.

Keep a can of Effecto Black Enamel handy in your garage. It's great for touching up banged fenders and rusty spots on chassis or body.

If you can't find Effecto at your local paint, hardware or accessory stores, $10,000,000, and he also contributed to the Church Pension Fund, to the spread of Simplified Spelling, for the study of methods of Americanization, and to various national and war charities.

He was given honors by Edinburgh University, which conferred upon him the degree of LL.D.; by the Republic of France, which made him Commander of the Legion of Honor; by the Queen of Holland, who gave him the Order of Orange and Nassau. By his purchase of Skibo Castle in Scotland he became known as Laird of Skibo, making his summer home there among his beloved highlands.

IN 1888 Carnegie married Louise Whitefield. Their only daughter Margaret was born in 1897, and was married April 23 of this year to Ensign Roswell Miller, U. S. N.

His wife and daughter survive the ironmaster, who, while greatly distressed by the war, was rejoiced over the League of Nations. On August 9 Mr. Carnegie wrote a letter in which he said, "I rejoice in having lived to see the day when, as Burns puts it, 'Man to man the world o'er shall brothers be for a' that.' I believe this happy condition is assured by the League of Nations, and that civilization will now march steadily onward, with no more great wars to mar its progress."

The funeral of this master of millions was held at Lenox, Mass., August 14. The burial was at Sleepy Hollow, New York.

Mr. Carnegie's intense interest in practical affairs resulted in several books, the first, "An American Four-in-Hand in Britain," appearing in 1883. This was followed by "Round the World," published in 1884; "Triumphant Democracy" in 1886; "The Gospel of Wealth" in 1900; "The Empire of Business" in 1902 (translated into eight languages); "The Life of James Watt" in 1906, and "Problems of Today" in 1909.

As the Missionary Tells It

The Woman Pays

AN OLD friend of mine who lived about nine miles away died a fortnight ago. He was a very typical heathen, but a decent sort of fellow, always willing to hear about Jesus Christ, and he allowed me to lay bare his own rotten, heathen life. I tried to get him to believe, but his wealth (he had some twenty or more women) always proved the stronger pull. He lay dying for about three days. During those three days each time that he seemed to get weaker and to be nearly slipping his cable, several of his wives were flogged unmercifully. As the old man again revived, it was firmly believed that the evil spirits hovering around to snatch his life from him were appeased by the pain inflicted on these poor women folk. But the time came when even flogging women was of no avail. However, these women will continue to get their periodical floggings in order that their lord will receive good treatment beyond the grave. All the Africans I have ever met are firm believers in life after death.—FROM A MISSIONARY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

The Despised and Rejected

MRS. J. D. FULLERTON, of Szemao, China, writes: "About three years ago the Lord led my husband and me to heed a call to Szemao. I remember as we approached the place we saw from the top of the mountain the wide plain with its hundreds of villages, and I said, 'Moses went up to the top of Pisgah and the Lord showed him the land.' 'This land is ours,' my husband replied. 'We will go in and possess it!' During the last year we have seen over 600 families of the Lisu tribe put away their idols and turn to the Lord. These peopl despised by the Chinese, but they chosen of the Lord. We have had y of difficulties, toil, and tears over Chinese, with few results, but amo these despised people God Himself done a wonderful work in brin them into the glorious life and lib of Jesus Christ."

ll doctrine of the Kingdom of d can be fairly described as of the central features of the s of Jesus. The phrase was more the Master's lips than any He made it the chief petition e of his Model Prayer, together of his brief definitions of its : "Thy Kingdom come, thy done on earth."

With all the difficulties and ces that remain there are today d women almost without number definitely seeking to bring in the m. Not only the thousands of aries who are permeating the world with Christian churches, , and homes, but the millions of sober Christion workers and busi- en who are as leaven in the lump arth's turmoil and planning. We have the divine plan, the divine method—there can be no question as to the outcome. Details are obscure, counsels may divide on minor points. But the principles of Jesus, we know, are the only right and lasting bases for the human brotherhood of the future. God is watching with a Father's solicitude while his sons and daughters clear the great earth-homestead he has appointed for them, preparing its fields and mines, organizing its interests and affairs. Day by day they are growing his Kingdom, as wheat is grown; building the city of God stones upon stones in the midst thereof. His spirit is Guide and Architect of all and in all.

The Kingdom-spirit is based on glad allegiance to the will of God—not mere submission or passive acquiescence, but a deliberate, whole-hearted acceptance of God's will. It is active and practical.

Humility is one of the watchwords of the Kingdom spirit. It is basic in the Sermon on the Mount, that great Kingdom-charter. It calls for great confidence in God and great forbearance toward men. Pride of person, pride of race, lust of power are its saddest hindrances still. These things still hold back individuals and nations alike from taking the "next step" toward the realization of God's will on earth. And in truth following the laws of the Kingdom is always a venture of faith, and often a leap in the dark. Without trust in the Father and a conviction that it is best to serve, men will soon turn back. But with such a faith and a vision of the possibilities of Jesus' way men will press on despite obstacles and disappointments innumerable.

Jesus' hearers could not shake themselves free from a narrow and local view of the will of God. They were held by the Jewish ideas of the Messiah as a political and military figure. Hence they misunderstood and misapplied what they heard, both friend and foe. We today glimpse Jesus' vision of a world brought into harmony with the Almighty, not by catastrophe and destruction but by faithful development of the possibilities of human life under the application of the Gospel. We do not feel like the fragments of a retreating army, but like the successful builders of a city. Yet we know that the outcome of all will be far greater than our dreams. To us the Kingdom is always coming, coming in new fulness of meaning. We hail each advance of the Kingdom's standards. We rejoice today in the growing unity of its heralds and ministers. We know not what shall be, but we are convinced it shall be better, finer, nearer to the desire of our Lord than anything we yet have seen.

American meat-dressing—yesterday and today

In the old days meat-dressing was purely a local business. There were one or more abattoirs in every city and town, and in the villages and on the farms most families did their own meat-dressing.

There was no scientific knowledge of sanitation and refrigeration, no ambitious study of meat-dressing methods and no adequate and intelligent system of animal and meat inspection.

* * *

The development of centralized packing organizations like that of Swift & Company brought big improvements in meat-dressing methods.

Thousands of travelers who yearly visit the packing plants in Chicago are impressed with the high state of cleanliness. But equally important is the rigid care exercised in the inspection of animals.

Only animals such as are sound and healthy reach your table as meat from the "U. S. Inspected" packing plants.

* * *

All packers doing an interstate business work under the supervision of the government.

Note the picture above to the right. This shows federal experts inspecting dressed pork. Every piece of meat that comes from Swift & Company's packing plants bears the O. K. of the U. S. government.

If America's meat industry were still a local unorganized business, inspection of meat would be out of the question.

Today, because of the development of the nation's packing industry to its present form and because of the rigid U. S. government inspection, American meat is the cleanest and healthiest in the world.

The profit that Swift & Company earns—a fraction of a cent per pound—is too small to have any noticeable effect on either live stock or meat prices.

India Grateful for He

The Battle With Famine Goes On Heroically and M
Hopefully Now

MORE helpful news comes from famine-stricken India. Although the suffering continues, there has been a marked abatement in certain localities. Rev. Chas. B. Hill, chairman of the Christian Herald Famine Relief Committee, writes under date of June 25, that through the aid of Herald readers' gifts and those of our Canadian friends the following relief grants have been made: In Behar and Orissa, 17,000 rupees; Telugo, 22,000 rupees; United Provinces, 7,000 rupees; Central Provinces and Central India, 30,000 rupees; Bombay, 52,000 rupees; Panjaub, 2,000 rupees; Bengal, 2,000 rupees; Travancore, 1,000 rupees.

Chairman Hill adds: "The letter of the Christian Herald's president, Mr. Graham Patterson, of May 12, reached me this week and I am very thankful for his suggestions. I was very glad indeed to have the address of the Indian Famine Relief Committee of Toronto, from whom we have now received $40,000 in two remittances."

This is a great and timely help to the Committee. This makes the sum total of relief to date $100,000.

With regard to the monsoon, Chairman Hill writes that "some rain is falling in nearly all the famine affected areas, but considering the dry and parched ground, it has not been sufficiently steady to warrant large expectations. It has, however, relieved anxiety in regard to drought, and will bring new grass and be a blessing to the starving cattle." Rainfall has increased in Malabar (South India), where the monsoon appears to be strengthening, and has been nearly general on the west coast as far north as Marmagoa and local in South Bombay. This is good news, and has inspired the workers with hope that the end of the suffering may not be very distant. The Central India areas are still in need of rain.

In communicating this news to the Christian Herald, Dr. Hill thanks its readers again and again for all the help they have rendered in India's time of crisis.

Letters also have come to us from many other parts of the famine area, each showing some new and pitiful phase of the general suffering. A worker of the Baptist Mission writes: "We are in great difficulties here owing to the terribly high price of rice, which is only 3 seers (3 times as dear as normal rates) for the rupee, so that for rice alone we must spend 15 rupees each month. However, we are depending on God, and hope help will be coming here soon."

A. J. Hubert, Missionary at Nalgonda, Deccan (South India), writes telling of thousands of starving people in that district who are sheltered in government poorhouses, many of them sick and suffering, others dead or dying. Many of the older are absolutely naked and will never be able to leave the place alive. In one famine camp there are about 4,000 people with not enough to eat, no clothes, no shelter against the wind and the rains which have now begun to set in. He adds: "They are half dead now and with the rain starting they will die like flies. We gave to all of those we could reach grain for at least one meal. Thousands of husbands have left their families and gone elsewhere looking for work an and have never returned." T mothers with their children are and wandering around without Some, to avoid the hard blowi have forced their way into the where they perish. "Nalgon Sooviapett, together," the lett "have a Christian community 000 to 25,000 natives looking and begging us to save their l those of their children."

Rev. R. B. Douglas, Jalna, Dominions), writes us of a vis by him and his wife to a c native Christians in a nearby "In many places by the waysid the whitened bones of cattle. of the cultivators have lost all beasts. The people we went are recent converts from a ca make their living partly by thie partly as wandering jugglers an charmers. They are counted a criminal tribes and are under police surveillance. When th ple became Christians about fi ago, they built little huts o stalks, thatched with date-palm which look like so many ex beehives. There is a tiny sch in the same style, and a fine litt of children, whom it is well wor to save from falling back into bad ways."

A. B. Franklin, of the Bheel at Shahada, writes that the mission bungalow is full of children and widows who have shelter there. One of the white aries found two women sitting ground, with something wrap rags in their bosoms. They lif bundles and presenting them missionary, said: "Great quee mercy on these dying worms. parents have died of starvatior is not procurable in our village, do not want to throw these y skeletons to the dogs. Take the If they live, they live; if they d die." The missionary could not to take them. She carried them i bungalow, warmed water and the dirt off their frail, little brown gave them milk to drink and that they could drink like hungry before they were put to sleep floor with the rest of the childr

Other children have been turn to the mission under similar conditions. The misery is indesc Missionary Franklin adds: "A many friends responded to my in the Christian Herald in Fel and I hope many more will do time, for the sake of the s babies among the Bheels."

Chairman Hill also sends a le thanks to the contributors of the tian Herald Famine Fund from Foss Westcott of Chota Najbur, dent of the National Council of M in India and the Metropolitan of the Church of England i country. THE deft use of blue and brown is a striking feature of this dining-room. The varied blues of the hangings and chair-seats are most effectively contrasted with the rich, warm brown tones of the walls, furnishings, and floor.

The floor is Armstrong's Plain Brown Linoleum. It is in perfect harmony with everything else in the room. From every practical standpoint, it is a real, permanent floor.

An occasional waxing will keep it in fine condition. It won't need refinishing. It will give long, economical service, because of the natural durability of linoleum and because the purchaser had the linoleum cemented down by the merchant's expert.

Armstrong's Linoleum can also be had in an attractive assortment of patterned designs, including the Jaspé and Parquetry Inlaids (both with the colors running clear through to the back), and printed carpet and matting effects.

Real linoleum is made of powdered cork, wood flour, and oxidized linseed oil, pressed on burlap. Genuine linoleum always has a burlap back, is flexible and not easy to tear. Be sure that you get it. Better still, ask for Armstrong's Linoleum by name. There is a difference.

Let the boy bathe himself

IT'S surprising how much more willingly a youngster takes his bath when you give him a cake of Ivory Soap and let him go ahead by himself.

Perhaps it's because Ivory floats, and he enjoys chasing the soap round the tub. Perhaps it's because Ivory makes such a thick, bubbling—yet easy-rinsing—lather that it never leaves any "high water" marks for mother to scold about. Perhaps it's because Ivory is so mild that it never smarts nor irritates his skin, no matter how hard he rubs.

Add to these qualities the fact that Ivory is white, as a skin soap should be. Also that it is as refined and dainty a soap as any one could want—unscented, but faintly fragrant with the pleasing natural odor of its high-grade ingredients. Ivory certainly offers everything to make everybody's bath a pleasure.

THE STRENGTH IN UNION

Federation in Ohio Is Making Better Church Buildings, Greater Sunday School Facilities, Widened Community Service, and It Challenges the Younger People to Fuller Religious Lives

By B. H. DARROW

THE State of Ohio, with its 6,152 country churches in twelve hundred townships, has an average of 278 people per church. Less than forty per cent. of this 278 are church members, and the attendance is rarely over half the membership.

The following table of findings, by the careful and thorough investigation of the Commission on Church and Country Life, shows a condition of over-churching and destructive competition rarely surpassed even in the economic world, where the slogan is, "Business is business."

TABLE OF 6,000 OHIO CHURCHES

4,000 have less than 100 members
3,000 have less than 75 members
2,000 have less than 50 members

PART TIME AND NON-RESIDENT MINISTRY

Four thousand, or two-thirds of total, have no resident minister

Twenty-six per cent. of the townships have no resident minister.

Less than 1,000, or one-sixth, have the full time of a minister.

Two thousand two hundred have one-quarter or less of a minister's service.

Three thousand three hundred have one-third or less of a minister's service.

Seven hundred have no regular minister.

In most of these communities several churches are trying to do what one church, if left alone, could do far more efficiently.

What would a business man do if he found such conditions in his plant?

What would he do with overlapping, duplication, poor tools and lack of team work among his workers?

Is not the Lord's work—the Churches' business—as worthy of business methods and efficiency as any effort man ever makes?

CHURCHES can get together for work and for worship and still retain the name they love and the participation in and support of the denominational interests which they have learned to love. Over threescore of successful attempts have been made, the older ones being in New England and most of the more recent ones in the Middle West.

How Does a Federated Church Operate?

It usually takes its name from the village or neighborhood. Thus, Northfield Federated Church, Greene Township Federated Church, Olmstead Community Church, or United Church of Garrettsville.

The minister, regardless of his own denominational connection, represents all denominations included in the federation, and attends their various conferences, synods, etc. Many of the federated church pastors find it very helpful thus to get the viewpoints and help of all denominations which they represent. The minister in some federated churches is of one of the denominations, as Rev. J. M. Keck at Northfield, a Methodist ministering to Presbyterians and Methodists, or as Rev. Mr. Shuhmacher in Greene Township, a Reformed minister serving a Methodist-Disciple-Baptist combine. In Garrettsville the people did not know for a long time what Rev. Mr. Tuttle's denominational affiliation was. They wanted a Christian program in action for themselves, but more especially for their children.

The minister does not lose touch with his own denominational interests while serving a federated church. He is merely dedicated as a peacemaker and unifier, a divine physician to heal the wounds of a community, and if he ever wants to return to a regular denominational church he should be all the more valuable for his experience.

Denominational leaders should be willing to release the best men they have for these sick communities, especially at this stage of the game, when each federation is strategic. Due to the shortage of ministers, there has been a reluctance on the part of some to do this.

The Building

IN PRACTICALLY all cases, the best building in construction and location is used for church services. Usually improvements are made. Often one of the other buildings is converted into a social hall or community center. The disposition and use of property varies in different localities and with different denominations. In most cases, that kept for use of the Federated Church is administered, kept in repair, etc., by the Federated Church Board.

Church Government

THE governing of the Federated Church has not proven the difficulty it was expected to be. The control of the federated churches scattered over the country varies widely. At some points there is an official board composed of the pastor, a pastor's cabinet, and a board of directors. The cabinet consists of a male and female representative from each church, appointed in any manner desired at the annual meeting of each denomination. The board of directors is composed of three representatives (both sexes) from the membership of each church. The above mentioned officials are appointed for one year, subject to reappointment.

In Garrettsville the officers are seven deacons, seven deaconesses, a clerk, a financial secretary, a treasurer, five trustees, etc. Greene Center and Northfield vary from either of the above. Each of the plans has been working without friction.

Any person belonging to any one of the denominations in the combine are members of the Federated Church. The acceptance of members from other churches also is the common rule.

Any person joining the Federated Church does so by uniting with one of the denominations represented. The tendency to demand a direct joining of the Federated Church must be killed at the root, because that would virtually amount to forming a new denomination and further muddling the situation.

Form of Services

LITTLE or no difficulty has been experienced as to form of service, the non-episcopal churches differing in such points as to the modern mind are non-essential. The modification, of course, depends on what denominations are included. In some, the administration of the Sacrament is carried on for each denomination according to its custom. Fitness to receive the Sacrament is a bigger concern to people today than whether it be administered kneeling at the altar rail or in the pews. The frequency of its administration has proven easy of adjustment. In one church, the every Sunday adminstering to one part of the congregation was gladly joined in by all present.

Most Federated Churches raise their local budget entirely irrespective of denomination, and the overhead, missionary and other funds are subscribed separately as before. Some churches have an envelope system on which the giver indicates his preference. In other cases, missionary and other funds are divided equally. So people need not give up their lifelong interests.

Other Organizations

SUNDAY school officers and women's and men's organizations have found little difficulty in merging, being ready to sacrifice a few selfish ambitions for the common good. As a matter of fact, the enlarged program put on by the Federated Church demands more of them than was the case before.

Sunday school leaflets, hymn books and like matters have been compromised satisfactorily.

Results

IN MANY cases it was federation or stagnation. Nothing but continued decline was in prospect.

Thus, three churches in Greene had experienced difficulty in raising $600 a year each for all religious work. Now they raise a budget of $1,800 and are looking forward to increasing that. Man after man who had not given before gave gladly. The union appealed to them.

Northfield had two churches, one of which depended on several hundred dollars' missionary funds to keep open. Now it is self-supporting.

In Olmsted Falls the support of the church was doubled by federating, the budget of the separate churches being $500 each and of the Federated Church $2,000.

It would seem that half of the home mission funds have been spent in keeping alive competitive churches. This day is rapidly passing.

The reunion of church forces has a wonderful effect on community spirit. It attracts people whom the divided churches could not reach. It makes possible a well-paid, full-time, resident minister, instead of the "a-hit-here-and-a-hit-there sermonizer." It makes possible better church buildings, better Sunday school facilities, magnified social center possibilities, and through all these factors it challenges young people to like their church and their community, and to recognize it as a place where red-blooded young men and young women may live full, active and well-rounded lives. It presents to them the more attractive side of country life. They find that the Church, after all, is interested in how happily they live now, and not, as one old minister said, "simply preparing them to make one grand getaway into the life to come."

WITH federation instead of 6,152 Ohio churches, one-third marking time and one-third slipping back to decay and despondency, we can have 3,500 big, strong, healthy church organizations: every one with a resident, full-time community leader; some of them with assistant pastors, giving all their time to community work; large, well-equipped buildings with gymnasiums, shower baths and reading rooms; every one with a program and an organization that reaches and sweetens, as never before, the lives of every man, woman and child.

THE OPPORTUNITY SCHOOL

A Denver Public Institution Whose Scholars Are Sorry When Sessions Stop and Glad When They Reopen

By
W. F. WILCOX

WE MAY venture the hope that the Opportunity School is but the prototype of the public school of the not distant future when the schools, instead of being open but a few hours a day, a few days in the year, shall be real schools of opportunity for all the people at any time of the day, during any period of the year, when most convenient for them.

And, more, that the schools will train them along lines of usefulness, in things they need most, the school adapting itself to the needs of the pupils, rather than the pupils adapting themselves to the narrow scopes of the school.

Who knows but the Opportunity School will be duplicated in every school of our land before many years?

THE janitors had struck and there had been no school sessions in the city that day. Yet I stood in a school building of that city, and hundreds came and went all day, and being told "There is no school today" they were sad and sorrowful. That night hundreds came for the night sessions, the young, the old, the lame, the halt, black and white, Jap and Chink, and from every nation, and there was not one who upon receiving the news "no school" was not sad. It was a calamity, a disappointment, a tragedy in the lives of all these people that the school's sessions were interrupted for a single day and night.

What school was this? None other than the famous "Opportunity School" of Denver, Colo., which was instituted in 1916 and is now rounding out its third year.

The school began at first at the suggestion of Superintendent Carlos M. Cole, who had in mind a school where any and all peoples, irrespective of caste, color, age, nationality, religion, present attainments, past training, financial status or what not, might come and attend and receive instruction, if he had the real desire to better his condition. And so the school was opened, and they came, and no questions were asked them, and no preliminary examinations or quizzes were held. Without red tape or fuss, those whose past opportunities had been neglected or to whom opportunity never knocked were admitted and set to the tasks which their heart and soul and very life demanded. Never was there a school like this, where every one in attendance was fired with ambition and energy and a consuming passion to make the most of flying opportunity and fleeting time, in an endeavor to advance himself and prepare to better his immediate state and condition in life. Here, without humiliation, without embarrassment or confusion, each finds his place, and, with the mark of his great desire constantly before him, aims toward it and usually succeeds.

THE school, in charge of Miss Emily Griffith, a most resourceful, masterly and lovable woman, has prospered and succeeded far beyond the wildest dreams of its promoter. To it have turned people from every walk in life. It is the great Opportunity of thousands and has made hundreds of better men and women. Over the doorway are the words, "Opportunity School," and such it is.

At first three rooms were used, with five teachers and twenty pupils; now in the third year there are forty-one teachers and 3,500 pupils. Classes start at 8:30 in the morning and the building is a hive of industry until 9:15 in the evening.

An old high school building is used, and every corner is in service. The superintendent was driven from one room to another, finally held her office in a corridor, and gradually, as demand increased, even the corridors and hallways were commandeered for class rooms, until now the superintendent has her desk in the vestibule hallway by the doorway. One more move and she will be on the outside!

What is taught? Why, this school teaches anything and everything that men and women need in order to prepare themselves for their immediate future and its work. Do any men or women feel that they are in the wrong work and that some other line would make them more successful? Here they have opportunity at night, after the day's work in the task they are unfitted for, to study the thing they believe will mean success to them. Here they get in the right place and find themselves. If young men and women in menial positions desire to better themselves for advancement, here they find the opportunity and the training.

EVERYBODY in the school knows what he is there for. Never was there such a school of energy, ambition, perseverance. To many the stern call of life has shown them their unpreparedness and they hasten to make amends. Here of a night I saw a little Russian Jew with thin gray hair straggling over his bald head, arguing with a Dalmatian past sixty about the spelling of a simple word. This in the foreigners' class. It is a melting-pot, this school. Here is a class in citizenship, composed of foreigners. Among them is a keen-eyed Frenchman and his little wife and a sleeping babe. The teacher is telling of the perils of Bolshevism. And it is well, for the class is intended to fit its members with a brand new guaranteed set of American ideals. From this room 1,800 men and women have gone to take citizenship papers. The work is not designed merely to help them to pass an examination, but to teach lessons of our community life, something of the history and sane ideas of the relations between capital and labor.

Do any young men or women have an eye on some position just beyond them? If they have the desire strong enough they come to the Opportunity School and prepare for it. They get ready for old "Opportunity."

One girl, working in a big packing plant, stuffs sausages all day long in a room at freezing temperature. At night she takes stenography and is now writing 85 words a minute. The vocational secretary of the school is paving the way that this woman may be given a position in the firm's office when she is capable of taking it, thus continuing in the employ of the packing company. And won't she be a really efficient stenographer after her experience in the packing plant?

Miss Emily Griffith, founder and principal of Denver's Opportunity School

Many young men in office positions are taking shorthand, saying that it will enlarge the scope of their work and ability and efficiency, and that they will be able to take better positions.

From the typewriting room humming with the click of 40 typewriters one passes into another busy with the tapping of the telegraph senders. A great many of these young people are holding jobs in the daytime and are studying nights to gain greater speed and efficiency.

YOU will find here classes in auto repair work, mechanical drawing, sheet metal work, stationary engineering, railroad telegraphy, train dispatching, show-card writing, shorthand, typewriting, bookkeeping, cooking, sewing, millinery, citizenship, English for foreigners, French, hairdressing, manicuring, and ungraded rooms for adults where they may receive instruction in anything they need in the next day's work to make them more efficient in their work and to make their job surer and safer and to ensure for them their bread and butter.

"Opportunity School" blazing over the front door might well be interpreted "Bread and Butter School."

The work in hairdressing, manicuring and millinery is taken not only by Denver women, but by others throughout the state who come to the city to take the courses and go back home to set up for themsel The school offers short cuts, very helpful to ma minds able to take advantage of them. More t 250 boys and girls who work during the attend the courses in the evening.

The school is practical. Its vocati courses are taught by those actually enga in that line ot work. These classes are desig to meet existing needs.

A petition came in, signed by eighty- men, for a class in stationary engineer The class was installed and meets twic week.

From the Colorado & Southern Rail shops nineteen men came and asked for tr ing in sheet metal work. They brought them their foreman for instructor.

THE automobile classes are most popu perhaps, as they are filled to the s limit. Up-stairs a lecturer was giving oral struction in the mechanical parts of a car in the basement workshop young men were tak cars apart and examining the pieces and parts v great care under expert guidance. Many of th dents are men who make their living by driving and want to learn something about the mechan part from a scientific standpoint so they can tell w is the matter with a car when it stops and be abl repair it. There are also automobile classes for wom

All day long, at hours to suit those who are seek the opportunities of the Opportunity School, cla are held. Young women in uniforms are busy learn cooking. There are cadet nurses from the cou hospital who are taking their dietetics for inva at this school. Nurses from other hospitals com different hours for instruction. There are classe domestic science too for young housekeepers. Ev little while comes a demand for a new class.

The latest is a course for domestics, to be inau rated soon. To meet the increased demand for effici maids and women for all kinds of housework Denver, Miss Griffith will inaugurate at her Opp tunity School a practical course in home work. G and women will be given thorough instruction in all duties of a maid, waitress and houseworker, so t the housewives of Denver homes may secure wom and girls who are trained. The girl will be given professional training which will make her entir acceptable to her employer, and at the same time give the girl a standing in a social way which has before pertained to the work. She will be able approach the employer with the confidence and be ing of a trained worker, and thus will be able to co mand the highest respect and confidence. The cou will consist of instruction in all the essential lines housework, such as cooking, cleaning, catering, wa ing on table, washing and ironing. The main princip followed in each of these lines will be taught so tha girl can easily conform to the individual tastes a customs of the employer without friction or emb rassment.

THE school aims to give the individual what t person wants and needs most from soup up. A one employed downtown may come directly to school without the expense of going home on the or of buying lunch downtown and secure a bowl soup and a sandwich. The soup is most nourishi thick with barley and noodles and everything th makes good soup, and it is free.

So there is really no excuse for any one with a r desire for knowledge and betterment of position to realize it. The school's purpose is to serve, a any one working downtown on a small salary, who no time to go home to dinner, may come to the eveni session, go to the basement and receive the soup a sandwich without expense. A wealthy lady of t city covers the expense of this luncheon. As many 200 people are served in a day. It is a mighty f thing for the girls who come in from the stores a offices, nervous from the day's work, with cold, w feet perhaps, with this nourishment and a chance calm down and pull themselves together; they into their classes fortified and prepared for the i struction that means so much to them. I am su no one receives a better return for money expend than this lady who sends in her check each month pay for the soup. Miss Griffith for two years persona supervised the making of the soup, but the work looking after the school has grown to such an exte that she was obliged to relieve herself of this burde

There is also a class for stammerers and stutterer One young man came to be cured of this impedime He was nervous; even his best girl refused to mar him because he stammered so. His father had spe much money in alleged cures, without result. spent $700 for one course of treatment without ava The boy was well-nigh hopeless of a cure when joined this class. The anti-stammering teacher of t school took him in charge, and in several weeks cur him so that he was able to give a lecture witho stammering, and his fiancée married him.

One of the many trade classes in the Opportunity School. These girls are learning millinery

During the winter a great many Japs attend the school, making up for missed opportunities.` During the janitors' strike these Japs were sore depressed. They counted every session of the school zealously, for well they knew that when spring opened they must go out to the beet fields of the surrounding country to labor through the summer, and there would be no school privileges like this.

THERE is cooperation in this school. A feature is the bulletin board in the lobby, which is a sort of employment agency without any one in charge. Whenever any one hears of a position he writes a note about it and pins it to this bulletin board. Any one coming along and desiring that position merely takes down the note telling about it and giving the particulars and goes after it. In one day twenty-five students were placed in positions by this automatic job finder.

The field of the school is constantly broadening. One of the progressive steps in rehabilitation education has been jointly undertaken by the Federal Board of Vocational Education and the Opportunity School of Denver. This school has been designated as the receiving station for the Denver Vocational Education District. The receiving station will serve three purposes.

First, it will receive men who need elementary preparation before undertaking vocational training. In the army were many men who were scarcely able to talk English. These will be given Americanization courses. Others were illiterate, not having had educational advantages. For these the Opportunity School will provide an elementary education.

The second class to benefit will be those who wish to take some kind of vocational training but are uncertain what branch to take up. These will have a chance to try out their choice at the Opportunity School before definitely setting out to follow any particular trade.

The third class includes those who wish to have some training immediately upon coming under the jurisdiction of the Federal Board. The members of this class will be sent to the Opportunity School to take advantage of some kind of training before being definitely assigned to a permanent course.

IF THERE ever was a teacher who was loved it is the superintendent, Miss Griffith. She has a marvelous grasp of the work, keeps in touch with the students, and there is a wonderful cooperative spirit manifest between all parties. Several years ago Miss Emily Griffith, principal of the Twenty-fourth Street school, worked and dreamed, planning for a great development of the little night school she conducted. She dreamed of a school which would provide an opportunity for every boy and girl, man and woman in Denver who wanted an education along business or academic lines. Always she talked of the plan and dream. She established a soup kitchen in connection with her night school in order that boys and girls working during the day, who wanted an education but couldn't afford to go home and return to school, paying two carfares, might come direct to the school and have something hot for supper before taking up their school work. Time and again she went into her own purse to keep the soup-pot filled.

Miss Griffith saw in her class, composed largely of foreign children, the great need for Americanization even before there was any thought of war. Deep-visioned woman that she is, she saw how easily these youths of foreign extraction are turned one way or the other to the good or injury of the nation, and she prayed, with a heart full of sympathy and love, that something might be done that the influence might be in the right direction. One day, with great courage and with a prayer on her lips, she presented her plan to the school board. She so earnestly wanted the school to be started, and feeling perhaps that others might not see in her plan what she did, she named her own salary far below what the board should have agreed to pay her. Then how she worked to develop the school and make it what she had dreamed and planned! And she has succeeded far beyond even what she may have dreamed in her wildest moments of expectancy. So the Opportunity School was born, born out of the mind and heart and soul and sympathy and experience and dreams of Emily Griffith, and it has been and still is Emily Griffith's school, and her personality is stamped in every class-room, and written in the work of every class and in the life of every student. It is the original opportunity school. It paved the way. Others may follow, but Denver's shines the brightest.

WHAT does this school cost Denver? I don't know. I never thought to inquire. It would be sacrilege. When one looks at the marvelous results obtained, the real worth-while efficiency rendered, such banal things as money, costs, expenses, are superfluous. What parent counts the cost or expense of clothing, housing, feeding, educating and caring for his bright, winsome, handsome, lovable child? Denver's residents, citizenship and youth are the better for the school. They are given a chance to render more efficient service and endeavor to make the best of life, results surely big enough to make any expenses trivial and inconsequential.

How Delmonico's Became a Church

" Delmonico's " before

THE sign used to read "Delmonico's." Inside, the waiters passed back and forth, serving meals. On the wall hung the menu, whilst in the basement the chefs prepared the food.

Today the sign reads, "Mission of the Holy Spirit." Inside, the tables have given way to pews. On the wall hangs the tablet that proclaims the hymns, and at the back of the room a reredos rises behind an altar.

Such was the transition of the Episcopal Church at Ohio State University in Columbus. But "Delmonico's" was not the beginning. The beginning was a moving picture theater. It was there the chapel got a foothold. Just as later the tables and stoves of the restaurant were replaced, so were the screen and the box office removed. That was only two academic years ago. Worship began. Novelty meant something; enterprise meant something; attendance followed as a result. Later the mission moved to an abandoned pool room.

But in October, 1919, when the Students' Army Training Corps was marched by order of the commandant to the Columbus churches for service, the pool room proved too small for the forty Episcopalians in the corps. It was then that Bishop Theodore I. Reese bought "Delmonico's," situated at 2036 North High Street. Thus from a nickelodeon to a restaurant moved a church. The large dining-room was divided into two parts. One half became the chapel proper; the other half became the Sunday school and social and supper room. The basement was turned into a pool room, but some of the fittings of the kitchen were retained. The Rev. F. C. F. Randolph was put in charge as rector.

Proud as it is of its small and humble beginnings, the Mission of the Holy Spirit is looking forward to bigger things as a result of the Nation-wide Campaign of the Episcopal Church, which is a project, as a Western bishop termed it, "to awaken a sleeping church to its twentieth century responsibilities."

Nor is that all. Ohio State University is planning a School of Religion, the first crystallization of a plan, long agitated, to have religious instruction in a state university. Instead of abstract courses in theology preparing men for the ministry, Ohio State plans to educate and train students for lay leadership in every form of Christian service. All of the Columbus churches will share in it. The university authorities will not control it, but will judge whether the work done is deserving of academic credit. If so, after a year's trial, the courses will become elective.

With its unique history the Mission of the Holy Spirit is expected to be one of the most attractive of the Columbus churches to students suddenly awakened by their studies to the modern aspects and needs of religion. By showing prospective lay leaders of the church how difficulties that can be surmounted are often beneficial to a religious organization, the Mission of the Holy Spirit hopes to inspire them to do likewise when this college work is finished and they take up their life of service for the King.

Training School for the Salvation Army

THE Salvation Army is planning to erect soon in New York City a new training school for officers to cost nearly $500,000. The building will be both college and home, having both class-rooms and dormitories under its roof. The course of instruction covers nine months and the daily life is regulated and planned according to strict military and religious rules. The candidates for an officership must pass vigorous tests both as to ability and adaptability. The graduating class this year numbered fifty-four, thirty-three being women. It is expected that the next class will be at least double that number.

CONSERVING THE HUMAN STOC

By C. MAC SHERIDAN

THE world is topsy-turvy after its long debauch. But it has taken a deep breath and turned its attention to what is obviously the first step in rebuilding for the future.

This first problem is that of conserving the strength and vitality of the human stock, for after nearly five years of devastating war the world's health is dangerously below par!

And this is the great concern of all governing bodies. It is universally admitted that no great work of reconstruction can be carried to full success by the nations that have suffered any or all of the wasting effects of war, until the question of developing a healthier and stronger people has had "first call" in operation and in results.

An attempt to visualize the world's health situation and the vast machinery necessary to deal with it is apt to produce a vague and unsatisfactory picture. If, however, you will draw the focal point down to a view of the United States, or to a still finer point, which reveals health conditions in the home community or the nearby city, the problem will be clearly disclosed.

Let us see just what the whole thing means to us in terms of personal safety, and find out whether the duties of citizenship obligate us to service in the campaign for national health and fitness.

Until recently, little personal or public discussion has been given those diseases which have masqueraded under many names, but more generally under the paradoxical appellation of "social diseases." The truth of the matter is that no diseases could be more anti-social—more dangerous to society. And here lies America's great and all-important work of disease prevention and control.

The country has never witnessed such vast preparation as is now under way to combat humanity's most insidious plagues. The campaign and its details should receive the intelligent interest and understanding of every right-minded man and woman—mother and father—because the future strength and cleanliness of the nation depend upon individual and community cooperation under the leadership of the governmental and private agencies charged with the responsibility of carrying the American Plan to a successful conclusion.

We dare not underestimate or disregard the vital issue involved, for facts and figures made available through the draft examination of millions of men are not only convincing but indisputable. These diseases have been, to quote Dr. Charles W. Eliot, "more destructive to the world since 1914 than all the artillery, rifles, hand-grenades and fire-blasts." An overwhelming mass of evidence can be submitted in support and proof of such a statement. This seems strange when with equal authority we are told that medical science is adequately equipped with the means of stamping out the infections now flourishing under the indictment of the whole world as "the greatest unconquered scourge of the race." Yet both statements are true. Perhaps we may discover the reason for the apparent failure of science if we look back on some of the old epidemic plagues now of little concern in the scale of importance.

SMALLPOX, once a terrible menace of public health and life, has been controlled and relegated to the background—almost forgotten among the minor diseases. Why? Science and public education forever destroyed its grip and made its epidemic reoccurrence an impossibility.

The story of yellow fever, once a deadly peril, is well known. Today, thanks to the heroic efforts of science along medical and educational lines, the frightful scourge of Spanish War days has been forced to a complete surrender. So it has been with typhoid and many lesser ills—science plus education and public opinion, that has been the successful formula.

Today's problem is the same. It differs in no essential point. The difficulty has been, not a scientific one, but to bring an important subject to the full attention of the public; to break down the ostrich-like attitude of men and women; to create a public consciousness, a national will to tolerate no longer conditions which undermine the moral and physical health of the community and the efficiency of the nation.

This educational effort is taking hold rapidly. Cities and towns are actually competing with each other in an effort to establish enviable records in the work of moral and physical renovation. The old handicap of silence and secrecy is being removed that science may have its untrammeled inning. So closely is the issue interwoven with our social, moral and economic life that press and pulpit alike are lending splendid assistance in many instances. Hundreds of communities are already equipped to carry on local campaigns, but their progress will be measured in a sense by the educational effort put forward by such agencies.

Local work is conducted as a rule under the plan formulated by the United States Public Health Service, the Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board, the American Social Hygiene Association and the state boards of health.

THE general method of community work, and the results obtained, are best illustrated by taking an actual case and showing just how the plan is put into operation. We will call the city selected Average City, for the facts in the case pertain equally to any number of communities already deep in the most important community health problem ever attempted.

Under the guidance of the state or city boards of health or some one of the national agencies, a local committee of energetic and aggressive men and women was formed in Average City. Their interest was first aroused when told of the actual conditions existing in their town and of the splendid possibilities for cleaning up effectively. The matter was put up to them as a definite obligation of good citizenship. They had a definite part to play in a great national movement.

The committee was subdivided into four sections, each to deal with one of the main phases of the general plan; namely, law enforcement; medical measures; educational work; community recreation.

As a preliminary work the committee conducted an exhaustive investigation of the community, going thoroughly into the question of commercialized vice, determining its extent and far-reaching effects. Another survey included a thorough canvass to ascertain the medical and hospital facilities of the community for handling the cases of those unfortunate people who were infected.

The general results, tabulated, showed that the community was tolerating a dangerous and unnecessary condition of affairs. It was found that the vice situation was responsible for at least ninety per cent. of the diseases which they had organized to combat. Investigation further disclosed the fact that the community was woefully lacking in measures for the protection of its healthy members, and for the treatment of those suffering from disease.

With the cooperation of governmental agencies an appeal was made to the Chamber of Commerce, commercial clubs, churches and welf societies for financial and active help in coping w the situation. The Police Department was infor of the fact that more than one hundred of the lead men and women of the community were demand a strict repression of the commercialized evils flour ing in the community. The earnest cooperation the police was splendid. Several hundred men women of the underworld, whose physical conditi were a distinct menace to the whole community, w apprehended and placed under forced medical tre ment.

In the meantime, funds had been raised for establishment and maintenance of a free public hea clinic. Here the most scientific treatment and kin care is to be had. Public health and industrial nur carried social and educational work into various pa of the community with splendid results; ma ignorant and poorly informed people were brought for rehabilitation, and undoubtedly many memb of the homes of diseased persons were saved fr infection.

While this work was progressing the sub-commit on educational work engaged in the spread of edu tional literature throughout the industrial plants a to the general public. Attention was also given the study of the recreational needs of the communi It was definitely pointed out and realized by t general committee that one of the most practi means of sending the moral and physical register the community upward would be the provision healthful and amusing recreational facilities for t public.

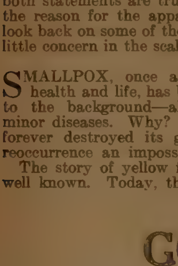
The Average City referred to has been operati for several months under the American plan. recent investigation has shown that very defini results have been secured; that the general cum lative effect of the work is piling up rapidly. Wh every American community has been organized a put to work in the same energetic way, we may ho for results which will mark this country as being w on the road toward actual freedom from a mena which has increased from year to year in spite the fact that medically the diseases were susceptib to control and cure. We must win. It is our mo important national, civic and personal job!

THE control of these dangerous infections was t most important subject dealt with at the gre conference of the Inter-Allied Committee of R Cross Societies held at Cannes, France, early in Apr Here the leading scientists of the world, representi their various countries, met for the purpose of putti down a definite program for international work. is particularly significant to note that importa among the measures considered absolutely essenti to the program were those dealing with the necessit of securing the systematic cooperation of moral an religious workers. Plans are being developed t enlist the cooperation of all moral welfare agencie for the fact is universally accepted that the religio and ethical principles underlying social conduct a an important factor in the preservation of health an social well-being generally.

Just how this phase of the work will progress an what the results will be depends largely on th attitude which will be generally adopted by chur welfare organizations. The present indications a that a great awakening is taking place, and that th churches of America, at least, will perform an important and vital service in the promotion of the mo sweeping campaign ever organized and put in motio for the physical and moral rehabilitation of the rac

GOD'S GARDEN—A Sermon for Young Folks

By REV. S. EDWARD YOUNG, D.D., Pastor Bedford Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, New York City



JUST weeds! And what are weeds? Nice or bad plants. Nice plants where they do not belong,—like ox-eye daisies you pick the petals off, saying, "Poor man, rich man, beggar man, thief," or buttercups or dandelions in the hayfield or vegetable garden—or bad plants—like the poison ivy or burdock or smartweed—ugly and ill anywhere. And the trouble of weeds? This: they choke and kill the good plants. They use the place and the strength of soil which would grow wheat or potatoes or tomatoes or peas or pretty flowers.

Are weeds much bother? You would not ask that question if you had taken care of a garden. They peep up soon as the flowers and vegetables and they never give you a day's rest. You must hoe them out. Some of them you must pull out by hand. Maybe they are so close to the corn or beans or radishes or onions that you can scarcely pull out the weeds without pulling up the good plants. Best way to get weeds out? Jerk them up, roots and all. No, simply cutting or pinching off above the ground will leave the roots to eat what the good plants need, and oh, so fast, the weeds will grow up again.

Where in the world do weeds come from? From seeds. Often weed seeds are among good plant seeds and get sown with them. That dandelion weed has a tuft for a parachute and sails its balloon away over from its corner until it lights in some other corner and puts its hooks into the ground and stays. That burdock burr—well, if it gets into your clothes or your horse's foretop, you will see how it sticks. After a while the seed will come out of the burr and grow.

Are there any other weeds than these? Yes. Thoughts, evil words, harmful habits. They are weeds. Sometimes they are so like the good that boys and girls have to look hard to tell them apart. They spring up all the time. Some people have wee thoughts right in church. Some Sunday schoo trained boys and girls let the wicked words or habit get in—and how they spread and stick tight! Sur enough, many come with the good seed—just an evi grain here or there in the day school or the college o the book or the movie. God give us teachers, parent as teachers, Sunday school teachers, everybody a teachers, who sow only pure seed! How get out the weed thoughts or words or habits? By clean cultivation, by cutting down the first peeping weed—tha is one way. By pulling them up by the roots—getting out of you the evil thing, the wicked wish, the selfishness, that causes them. God help uproot all these this minute as we stop right here and ask him to do it! Have plenty of good seed in any growing—truths you have learned about God and duty.

"My heart is God's little garden
And the plants that I grow each day
Springing thoughts that I let harden
And the words he hears me say."

MOTION PICTURES IN THE CHURCH

By CHARLES E. McCARTHY

CHURCHES of various denominations throughout the country are giving practical demonstrations that the motion picture can and does yield gratifying results in religious work. ıe Methodist Episcopal Church presents a striking ra . At the Centenary celebration in Columbus, O , the church uses of motion pictures were given an ex ustive examination, wi the result that the le ers of the church, in meeting assembled, re mmended that all ch ches in the Metho di communion should ex bit motion pictures, bo as a means of st ulating church at te lance and as a most ef tive medium for pr ching the Gospel of C ist.

> THE Editors of the Christian Herald invite letters and articles from pastors and others telling of their experiences with motion pictures in church work.
> A prize of $25 will be given for the best letter received up to December 15 on "How We Made the Movies Help Our Church."
> We want plain statements of actual experiences that will help other churches.

t this convention the h est motion picture e en ever built carried t message of the films, in giant characters, to vast as mblages. Some of the people in these assemblages h never before seen motion pictures; but so con v ing was the argument which the pictures them se es presented that virtually all of these people im m iately became enthusiastic converts to the church u of films.

nother result was that 6,000 projection machines w e contracted for on the spot by representatives of M thodist Episcopal churches from all over the c ntry; and the indications are that in the near f ure, with the assistance which small churches will r eive from Methodist Episcopal authorities, the u of motion pictures will become more or less g eral throughout the Methodist denomination.

LL over the country clergymen have been using the screen as an auxiliary to the pulpit; and it a significant commentary that very few who have d this new method have abandoned it.

The Rev. Dr. Christian F. Reisner was the pioneer o blazed the way for motion pictures in church rk. When Dr. Reisner was called from Denver Grace Methodist Episcopal Church on the upper st Side of New York City ten years ago, he found a house of worship seating 1,600, in an eminently pectable neighborhood of well-to-do folk. But parently they were not the church-going kind, for new minister preached to empty pews. He soon d of this and resolved to try heroic treatment. tion pictures were very crude then, but Dr. Reisner ought they might attract people to his church. ey did. Dr. Reisner's methods kept pace with the ift evolution of the new art. The present system ces the motion pictures, now a vital factor in the of a very large and earnest congregation, in charge the assistant pastor. Special matinees for children given every Saturday afternoon; a Saturday ening show for adults and Sunday evening sermons illustrated with films. Travelogues, other educa nal films and photoplays of the same quality and riety offered in the best theaters are used; for, the ject being to bring people within the influence of church, pains are naturally taken to offer some ing that will attract.

Sunday school pupils are given cards containing nouncements of services on the next Sunday. In der to have these taken home and kept for a week give the whole family a chance to read and remem r, the cards are good for two of the three cents' mission price at the next Saturday matinee. There no charge for the Saturday evening show for adults, t a contribution box near the door enables ose who choose to help defray expenses for the m rental, etc. Practically all elect to help. On nday evenings no part of the regular service is ridged except the sermon, which is confined to teen minutes to allow time for the motion pictures. he weather has to be bad indeed if those 1,600 seats not filled.

A SOMEWHAT different, but equally effective, plan is used by the Rev. Harvey E. Holt, pastor North Presbyterian Church, Cleveland, Ohio. he neighborhood has been given over to factories d the old American families had all moved away, eir places being taken by Croatians, Slovenians, d other mid-Europeans. As soon as he was con nced that conventional methods were unavailing, e young minister tried replacing the sermon with a avelogue or other educational film, but retaining e singing, Scripture reading and prayer. No dmission was charged, but a collection was ken up to pay expenses. Attendance increased mediately; and now the church is crowded to pacity at every service, and scores actually are rned away.

Practically all the churches in Troy, N. Y., were mplaining of their extremely small congregations on Sunday evenings. The Rev. Dr. Thomas H. Sprague, pastor of the First Baptist Church, introduced a stereopticon, and filled his church without in any way interfering with the spirit of worship. On the contrary, he maintains that the pictures assist that spirit.

Finding his downtown neighborhood deserted on Sunday evenings, the Rev. Harry I. Murkland, of Central Methodist Episcopal Church, Newark, N. J., announced a sermon on the new régime in the Holy Land, to be preceded by a motion picture on "A Trip Through Palestine." He preached to a full house.

Since the appeal of the motion picture is universal, the chief concern of the minister who would employ its undisputed drawing power is to select the particular kind of motion picture most likely to appeal to his community and best fitted to convey his message. Travelogues, of which a great variety is available, will be effective in the best residential districts. Animated drawings, with moving diagrams of mechanical processes, will appeal to boys and young men in manufacturing districts, probably the most difficult class to reach. Again, photoplays from famous books and plays will attract in college towns—and, indeed, in all centers of educated folk. There is an abundance of such material of the finest quality.

Aside from the exhibition of pictures in his own church or parish house, the minister interested in motion pictures can perform a great service to the community and also to his church by cooperation with the management of regular motion picture theaters. There is no gainsaying the hold which motion pictures have on the public; and now that the saloons are closed, leaving hundreds of thousands without their accustomed gathering-place, it is a duty of civic leaders to promote the work of the motion picture theater as a substitute for the saloon.

The Movies and Morals

By JOHN C. FLINN

(From an Address Delivered at the Methodist Tercentenary Convention at Columbus)

JUST as the war proved that electricity, the automobile, and the airship can be used as forces for destruction as well as progress, so the motion picture can become a mighty agency for good or evil according to the people in whose hands it rests.

Since the first of July, when national prohibition went into effect, the moral responsibility of motion picture producers and exhibitors has increased several fold. The saloon, the moving picture's strongest competitor, has gone out of business. The demand for pictures is greater than ever before. I proved this recently by a survey which I made of over two hundred districts of the United States in both "wet" and "dry" territory, before the prohibition law was passed. The statistics which I secured at that time showed that in 72 per cent. of the cases in which a town had been legislated from the "wet" into the "dry" column, business at the motion picture theater box office had increased. The average amount of this increase was 22 per cent. Of the other exhibitors who reported, 25 per cent. saw little change, and only 3 per cent. were against prohibition for business reasons. From the sociological standpoint also, these figures are interesting. For instance, it was determined that 37 per cent. of the increased attendance was drawn from the family trade, 35 per cent. were working people, and 28 per cent. were of the so-called middle class of patrons. Of 100 exhibitors questioned, 89 stated that prohibition has seen a striking increase in the number of women accompanied by men at their theaters.

What do these figures mean? To me they have a profound significance, for they indicate that the motion picture theater is taking the place of the saloon in our daily life. The sign "Family Entrance" has been taken forever from the grogshop and swung over the moving picture theater entrance. Thousands of people are finding their way into the picture houses who never knew that form of entertainment before. It is a healthy sign. Upon the well-meaning people who brought about national prohibition and upon the right-thinking motion picture producers and exhibitors rests the responsibility that the substitute shall continue to be the clean moving picture theater rather than the low card dive or the disorderly house.

Never was there a greater supply of first-class pictures to meet this increased demand. New York, California, Florida, Alaska and New England, in this country, and many sections of Europe have their studios, where pictures are produced.

For the past four years, with Europe torn by war, the American producer has practically had control of the world market for the sale of motion pictures. American life, manners, and customs have been revealed to practically every nation on the globe through the screen. The picture you see today will be shown tomorrow in China, India, France, South America, and throughout the whole civilized world. The American-made picture is now supreme. To remain so, it must keep up to the high standard demanded by American audiences, which is the highest in the world.

The films which are exported from New York are mighty instruments for bringing about a better understanding of the real America abroad, which will be the only logical basis for a real universal peace or League of Nations. President Wilson is an ardent believer in the power of the motion picture. He regards it as a 100 per cent. efficient medium for the transmission of ideas. The organized motion picture industry of America stands ready to head or assist in every possible practical way any movement which has for its purpose the betterment of our country and the advancement of the well-being of the world.

THE WILD MEN OF TAP TEANG

IN THE recesses of the mountains at Chong, about fifteen miles east of Tap Teang, Siam, there live in the mountain jungles a folk of negroid features with woolly pates.

They live in the open under the shade of big forest trees and wear no clothing.

At night they keep fires burning to guard themselves from tigers and other prowling creatures. For food they dig up roots and gather wild plants and tender leaves of certain trees and nuts. They also shoot monkeys, birds and other creatures with poisoned arrows blown through long reed blowpipes which they handle with great skill. They easily bring down monkeys in this way from the tops of lofty trees. They do not cultivate gardens or fields.

When they go on a hunting expedition they dig a hole in the ground and leave in these holes their smaller children and babes, covering the mouth of the hole with branches. The youngsters are quite safe, as the wild creatures fear what looks like a baited trap and give the hole a wide berth.

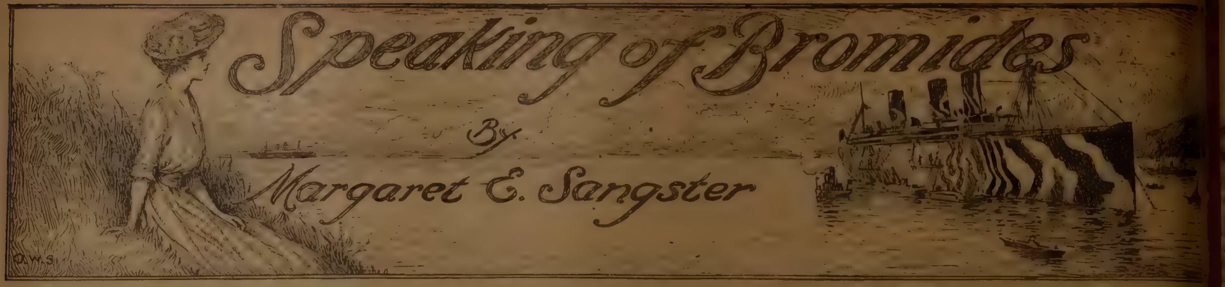
Plowing in Siam by civilized natives. The Tap Teangs do not cultivate at all

A few of the folk have learned to speak Siamese and wear clothing, and occasionally visit Siamese villages on begging expeditions. One day they visited our mission just at the close of a prayer meeting when tea was being served. The last cup was passed to them and more sent for. As they observed our people seated on the ground in groups sipping their tea, they formed a circle likewise. In the center there was a single cup of tea and one spoon; then taking turns by spoonfuls they drained the cup.

Our people got out a gramaphone. They seemed to comprehend the music played, but when a Siamese theatrical group got busy it was too much for them. They could not figure out how so many people could get into so small a box. They walked around and around peeking above and under and feeling the air for explanation of the mystery and shook their heads in amazement.

We asked their names; they answered the equivalent in Siamese. One woman they called Narok (Hades), explaining she was a terror when her temper was up. We asked if they worshiped Buddha. They replied, "No." "What religion have you?" They pointed to the sky and replied, "We worship the big person up there." We learned also that they feared evil spirits.

We gave them some old shoes and old clothes. They got thoroughly mixed up over the clothes, the men garbing themselves in the dresses and the women trying to put on the trousers and jackets. There were just half enough shoes to go around, so they shared equally and went away happy and contented, "one shoe off and one shoe on."



Speaking of Bromides

By Margaret E. Sangster

I HAD just finished the last paragraph of an article when the Newest Member of the Staff walked into the room. It was a nice last paragraph—a nice thought nicely stated in nice words—and so I read it aloud, perhaps a bit complacently.

"How's that?" I questioned when I had finished reading. "Don't you think it sums up the idea?"

The Newest Member of the Staff has been so short a time in the magazine game that he is still brutally frank with writers. He listened thoughtfully as I read the paragraph and then he spoke.

"It's a bromide," he said shortly; "it's all been said before—dozens of times. And in practically the same way."

I looked at him in astonishment.

"Then," I said at last, "Then what——"

The Newest Member of the Staff interrupted.

"Of course," he said, "it does sum up the idea. But I'd leave it out, just the same."

Well, I rewrote that last paragraph. I made it into a very different sort of a paragraph. And then I added it to my article, without asking any more opinions. And I knew, in my heart, that the article was better for that bit of re-writing. I had summed up my idea—but differently. And to hold the interest of any audience one must try to be different.

A BROMIDE, medically speaking, is a drug that dulls the senses. But a bromide speaking colloquially—in the vernacular of New York—is something commonplace, something dull and extremely ordinary. A bromide is drab, gray-colored and does exactly what he is expected to say and do. And for that reason a bromide is usually classed as a bore.

The editor of a certain magazine told me a few days ago that there were only thirty-six known plots in the world. "Every story that you read," he said, "is a variation of one of those plots. Every story in the history of the world is founded on one of them. There is nothing new under the sun to work with—nothing new under the sun! So fiction depends entirely upon the originality of the writer—entirely upon telling an old story in the cleverest, newest way."

Consider the number of books of fiction that are published annually in the United States. Add to that number the books that are published in England and France and every other reading nation. The total would run far into the thousands—perhaps into the millions. And every one of them is founded on one of the thirty-six original plots. And yet every one of them, practically, is a new story.

Folks say, as the editor said, that there is nothing new under the sun. They say that there never will be anything new. And yet, by putting a combination of old things together in a new way, wonderful inventions have been given to the world. The steamboat was greeted with astonishment. And yet the steamboat was only a combination of a great many old ideas. The train and the telephone and the wireless telegraph were also old ideas—with their formulas changed. The airplane and the submarine were built around natural laws that were ancient when the first caveman killed his first enemy with a rough stone hatchet.

JUST after we entered the war, in 1917, I was privileged to go one day and see a boat camouflaged. It was interesting—extremely interesting—and as I watched the clever artists wielding their equally clever brushes, I became lost in the fascination of watching. They painted strange swaying lines in weird colors—queer contorted shapes in vivid wash. And I, watching them, wondered why they were doing it in just that way. Finally I asked the man who seemed to be the director of the group of artists about the plan that they worked by.

"You do it to make the boats disappear, don't you?" I questioned. "You do it so that they can't be distinguished when they're looked at through submarine periscopes?"

"We do our work partly for that re the man answered, "and partly to th the guns off their range. Each boat is c ouflaged by a system of very careful figu that swings the boat around a certain n ber of points."

I watched the artists with a renewed terest. It was a long moment before I sp again.

"The principle of camouflage is bra new, isn't it?" I questioned.

The man laughed.

"Perhaps modern camouflage is new," told me, "but the principle of camoufl isn't. I seem to remember hearing abou certain siege of a certain ancient city, cal Troy . . ."

My knowledge of Greek history is go farther, every year, into the past. But too, seem to remember hearing about th siege! I remember how the Greeks c structed a great wooden horse which th hollowed out and filled with warriors- remember how the Trojans, being very man people with very human curiosi came out to look at the horse, and eventua dragged it through the heavy gates and i their city. That was camouflage.

IT ISN'T necessary to hunt through t world for a new idea before one can d worth-while bit of writing. It isn't necessa to go about searching for a new truth bef one can effectively make the world a bett place. It isn't necessary to find an entire new theme before you draw a picture. F so they tell us, there is nothing new und the sun.

But it is necessary—if you're going make your story interesting, and your truth convin ing, and your picture satisfying—to do whatev work you do in the newest and best way.

There's another old maxim that's often quote "Variety is the spice of life," it says. And it's v true. Variety is the spice of life. Variety reliev the days of their sameness, the weeks of their commo place qualities, and the years of their drab coloring.

Friends of mine, don't think that I'm advising y to throw away conventional things and give over of your time and ability to being original and new a different, for that extreme is as terrible as the oth one of being a bromide. A slice of gingerbread th was all ginger wouldn't be very good eating, would i A life that is all spice isn't a very good life to live i Don't allow your ideas to grow stereotyped- that's all. Don't allow yourself to think only alo one line. Don't allow yourself to say, "What's t use of doing anything different? There's nothin new!" Be progressive. Our ancestors beat out the grain between two stones before they baked brea we send our grain to the mill and have it made int flour before we do our baking. But the principle the same. It isn't a new idea.

More Than Cloth to Make a Dress

BETSY always wears such lovely clothes!
Why, her little dresses are as pretty
As the ones that folks buy in the city!
But she makes 'em all herself! Land knows
How she happens just ter touch the places
That she should with little bows an' laces!

Molly—why, she's just the other way;
She spends lots o' money for her things;
Twice a year she goes ter town, an' brings
All the latest styles back home; they say
She has hats that cost most twenty dollars;
When the bills come, guess her daddy hollers!

Funny thing about it is that Molly
Looks just out o' date fer all her style;
Looks—well, frumpy! Betsy, all the while,
Seems just like a great big dressed-up dolly.
It's a talent, lookin' well in clothes;
It's a business only some folks knows.

Clothes is just like other things, I guess;
It's the way you do a thing that makes
It worth while or not; I guess it takes Something more than cloth ter make a dress!

A Church That Came by Parcel Post

HIGH on a hill stands the Church that came by parcel post! Up to it from the valley comes the Road from Home. On all sides of it are the snow-capped mountains of northern California. And to reach it from any direction at least one range of 3,000 feet must be crossed.

To learn the story of the Church That Came by Parcel Post one might quite properly go to Sandy Bar Bob, for his name is one of three which appear on the certificate of donors. But that would not take into account a certain difficulty in language, for Sandy Bar Bob is a Karoc Indian. Also many, many moons have turned Sandy Bar Bob's black hair to a whiteness akin to the snow upon the mountain tops. And the passing of the years has made him as silent as the mountains, too, save only when he is bouncing on his knee a chubby great-granddaughter. Then Sandy Bar Bob croons the lullabies that years ago a Karoc brave sang to a helpless papoose who was to come to be known in the terminology of the white man as Sandy Bar Bob.

So to learn the story of the Church That Came by Parcel Post it will be better by far to go to the Rev. C. W. Baker, missionary of the Episcopal Church, who came on horseback to the church, and is now its rector.

Mr. Baker will tell you that it was in the fall of 1915 that the work on the church at Orleans began. The missionary then was the Rev. John E. Shea. He had spread the Gospel so successfully that the Karoc Indians of this isolated region asked for a house of worship. One of them, an Indian woman known as Fanny Bacon, even offered as a site some land she owned. So the plans for the church were made, but the material was not at hand.

Undismayed, the Episcopal missionary decided that come what might he would build his church. He sent for lumber and it came—by parcel post. He sent for shingles and they came—by parcel post. He sent for stained glass and it came—by parcel post. He sent for bells and they came—by parcel post. He sent for a stove and it came—by parcel post. He sent for furnishings and they came—by parcel post. He sent for Bibles and prayer books and hym books and they came—by parcel post. Had he sen for a choir it might have come—by parcel post.

It was in the winter-time that the church wa arriving by parcel post, and in winter the parcel pos arrives by pack mule. It is not easy going, either. I one direction lies Eureka; in the other the Souther Pacific Railroad. In winter it takes two days' har traveling to reach Orleans from Eureka, and from th Southern Pacific it takes two days and a half. Al at least seven miles of the way must be made on skis and for those seven miles the pack mules that brin the parcel post have to wear snowshoes!

But in 1916 on the Third Sunday after Trinity th snow-capped peaks that surround Orleans awakened t the echo of bells that sounded clear and far from th Church That Came by Parcel Post. And on tha day the church was consecrated by Bishop Moreland and Sandy Bar Bob was there, and so was Fanny Bacon and all the Karoc Indians who had built the church that came from over the hills and far away.

Additional Letters Answering the Challenge of After-the-War Opportunity

Seriousness and Practical Idealism Are Needed, declares Dr. Finis Idleman

IN REPLY to your question, "How will the young People's Movement meet the challenge of 'after the war' opportunity?" I should like to say that it will need to do it with the same enthusiasm which it had in its inception and which carried it through a very considerable period. But it must have much more. A sense of seriousness and practical idealism has come into the average young man who has been called into the service of his country. This seriousness must be met by a very practical program.

The old denominational boundaries which divided the Young People's Movement into various bodies have less excuse than ever to exist. While the application of the principles of Jesus to modern society during these reconstruction days must be largely made by the young, no amount of relays or excursions or conventions can substitute for the downright introduction of the Sermon on the Mount to everyday life. The heroism which was discovered on the field of battle must not be permitted to go unchallenged in the presence of the evangelization of the world.

If the Young People's Movement will prepare for the united Church of tomorrow—which alone can deal with the problems of a common social order—and if it will lay tribute upon the possible leadership which the war discovered for the total missionary task, it will both save to itself its heroic young manhood now returning to fellowship and save the world by the contribution of an unprecedented service.

Finis Idleman.

Young Men Return With Spiritual Reactions, writes Daniel A. Poling

MORE than two hundred thousand Christian Endeavorers of North America were with the colors during the war. Some of these come back to us with the highest honors of foreign and home service. On land and sea and in the air they have offered their lives for liberty; they have presented their bodies on freedom's altar in the name of justice and brotherhood.

They have experienced the spiritual reactions of their complete surrender to a worthy cause. Now they are coming back, and they are coming back to the Church. He has not read the signs of the times aright, he does not know the mind of man in this great hour, who says that the soldier has no ear for the ministry of the Church, no heart for the message of the Christ.

In France, in Germany and in America I found him more acutely sensitive to spiritual impressions, more quickly responsive to the vital appeals of the Christian religion, than the average man of peace.

The Christian Endeavor program of activities already presented is not an apologetic. It recognizes first of all the necessity for a changed life, in order that the inevitable world changes shall be Christian. It begins with the proposition that Jesus is the only sufficient Saviour for men and for states. It then relates itself definitely to the social, industrial, political and citizenship problems of the hour. It is a distinct challenge for the young man who comes back from the crusade that led him across the bloody fields of Europe, to face the even greater tasks of the crusades of peace.

In a word, then, the answer of Christian Endeavor to the challenge of after-the-war opportunity is a call to the youth of the Church to be and to do.

Meet the Returning Boys With a Program, is Robert P. Anderson's Suggestion

A MAN is as young as his optimism. When the heart grows cold it grows old and there are lions in the path that seem not only formidable but invincible. But youth sees few lions. It hears of them, but does not quite believe in them. Youth is optimistic. The shining glory of the future and of its ideals dispels the gloom of all past failure.

This is the hopeful feature in the present situation, when our boys are returning from blood-red battlefields. In France they did not treasure or weigh what could or could not be done; they attacked the impossible and won out. When they come back they will face life's problems in the same spirit, unafraid.

The boys who went forth to war from Sunday school and Christian Endeavor Society will return better men than when they left. "What about your plans when you come home?" a young lieutenant was asked. He had been a Christian Endeavorer in his home church and had left college, where he was studying for the ministry, to enlist. "I am not changed," he said simply. That is true of multitudes.

Christian Endeavor Societies have learned in these four years that they hold a strategic position in the Church. They know that it is imperative that the returning boys be linked up with the program of the Church, and at once, on their return. The society is the church's ready hand. Unless it functions the Church may fail to hold the boys. There may be a noisy and even tearful welcome in public meeting, a public recognition of the young persons' service to the country, but the fireworks will die out and the boys will slip back into—what? Christian Endeavor is trying to meet the situation with an adequate program of work. It sees that the salvation of our boys depends on their having something worth while to do when they return. If they are left alone, they will drift.

Returning boys are given back the positions in societies that they held when they left to go to war. If they were not then officers they are given positions on live committees, and tasks are assigned to them to do.

Christian Endeavor is urging those returning soldiers who are fitted for it to give themselves to full-time Christian service as pastors, missionaries, Y. M. C. A., or social-service secretaries and workers.

The young people of the Church are ready and they will answer any challenge. Is the Church ready with a program that will inspire them and hold them? That is the great question.

Must Express Themselves in Social Service, says Rev. Peter Ainslee

THE Young People's Movements will meet the challenge of after-the-war opportunity by expressing their religion in social terms and lending themselves freely to a sane interpretation of social justice as well as personal help, in helping others who are on the wrong road to find the right. This may cost inconvenience and deny us some personal pleasures, but a religion is nothing that does not cost us something, and our personal pleasures must be educated to find satisfaction in being helpers on the way.

The Church Should Manifest Sound Sense and Strong Steadiness, asserts Dr. Alfred Williams Anthony

THE great fundamentals of human nature do not change over night, nor in a year. Generations and ages have been necessary to bring the family of men up to its present condition, and sometimes, when hatred and war stalk abroad, it seems as though the development had proceeded but a little above the lower levels.

Man is a religious being; his religion is a part of his nature as much as are his teeth, his backbone, and his appetite. The form in which religion expresses itself may vary almost infinitely; but religion itself remains constant in a human being and the race.

The challenges, therefore, which come to the Church and to her young people out of this great war are challenges which run back to three questions: What is normal? What is natural? What is real?

The normal is that which is regular, as over against the occasional and spasmodic. Men discredit in religion that which is eccentric, spasmodic, irrational and absurd. They have no more use for religious insanity or religious intoxication than they have for mental insanity and physical drunkenness. One of the challenges today is for sound sense and strong steadiness in religious profession and in Christian experience. The returning soldier and sailor boys are looking for this. These men are not to be stampeded by any frenzy, or any claptrap of excitement. They are eager to know the fundamental experiences of the human soul, and those things which abide.

The first insistence, therefore, is that those who seek to present the claims of Christianity acceptably to the great throngs of young men who have been serving the cause of human welfare under arms, is that they shall speak to them, as did Paul before Festus, "the words of truth and soberness."

The second insistence of the challenge is that religion shall be recognized as fundamentally natural to man. He is religious; he cannot help it.

And the third insistence of the new challenge is that a man shall be very real. The soldier and sailor boys have faced stern realities; they have punctured the bubbles of pride and pretence; they want now dead earnestness and straight honor.

We are not obliged to devise new contrivances through which to present our Christian program, so much as we are called upon now to make everything we do and everything we say straight from the shoulder, normal, natural and real.

Alfred Wms. Anthony

Executive Secretary Home Missions Council.

Train Them for Christian Leadership, says Dr. Arthur J. Smith

I BELIEVE the boys who are changing from khaki to citizen's dress will respond to the challenge of Christian leadership if the Young People's Movement will first hold to a positive Gospel—a Gospel that produces miracles in the souls of men—that leads to transformation in their lives. Second—if they will open to them the door of service that calls for the heroic and requires real sacrifice. They have been responding to heroic calls, obeying heroic commands, and have been doing heroic things "Over There." Third—if the Young People's Movement will devise a method of training them for the service with which they are unfamiliar.

Courses of study have been devised to prepare men for work in the arts and sciences, engineering, in business, for missionary work, in the pastorate, but courses have not been devised that will train men for the work of Christian leadership while they remain active in business or professional life.

Arthur J. Smith

General Secretary of the New York Evangelistic Committee.

The Church Must Serve the Community

IN a discussion "How Can the Modern Church Serve the Community?" in the Social Service Review, Naillil Archer says:

"For the last two decades pastors have been battling with obstacles in an effort to advance campaigns of church attendance which would inspire a Sunday night audience of reasonable proportion. Sunday school officials have announced that from fifty to seventy-five per cent. of the children of teen age disappear from the rolls of Sunday school attendance. Young people's societies felt a dearth as well. Rural districts were obliged to acknowledge that in the main the Church was losing its grip on the young people.

"Before planning a social service program for his church the pastor and his official counselors should frequent the streets of the villages, towns, and cities, near the time for the regular church service on the Sabbath day, and learn how many young people can be found walking the streets, assembling before motion-picture houses and downtown theaters, lounging in the parks, hiking through the surrounding country, and using athletic fields. Streets teem with young people on the Sabbath day.

"If young people have at one time been attached to the church, why have they left it? If churches are in the community, why do not young people flock to their doors to enjoy the privileges of church society? In the coming days, and soon, the Church must answer these questions if it is to be perpetuated in the lives of the coming generations."

HOW TO KNOW GOD BETTER

A SERMON

By

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT—Col. 1:10. "Increasing in the knowledge of God."

I WANT to speak about growth in spiritual knowledge. How can we strengthen our grip of spiritual realities? How can we enter more penetratingly into the unsearchable riches of Christ? How can we get at life's marrow, at its pith, its real good, its God? These questions suggest the subject of our meditation.

I want to recall two or three helpful counsels which indicate to us the way of larger growth in the knowledge of God.

"Be still, and know that I am God." Stillness is one of the conditions of knowledge. This stillness is not the opposite to noise and tumult, but the opposite of excessive and perspiring movement. We use the same variation of the figure in our colloquial speech. We advise men to "take things a little more quietly." The counsel does not suggest the abatement of clamor, but the relaxing of intensity, the slackening of speed "Be still," release the strain, moderate the speed, ease down a little!

Surely this is a very pertinent warning for our own day. How many men and women are living at high pressure, the high pressure which is indicative of perilous strain! No man gets the best out of life whose life is on the stretch. Even the best violin needs to have its strings occasionally relaxed. Its music will fail if the strain is persistent. The principle applies to every department of our being. Physical strain is antagonistic to the highest good. Mental strain is not productive of fruitful solutions. To leave a bewildering problem, and to ease the mind by giving it temporary leisure, is often the first and best step to its ultimate unravelment.

AND is there not too much strain in the life of the spirit? There is one line in that great and beautiful hymn, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," which I always feel is somewhat of a discord: "Hangs my helpless soul on thee!" I do not like the stretch and the strain which are suggested by the words. It reminds one of the picture with which we are all familiar, and which is found adorning the walls of so many homes. There is a wild and tempestuous sea, and a rock rising out of the deep in the shape of a cross, and clinging to the cold rock there is the figure of a woman with agonized face and streaming hair, holding on for bare life.

I do not like the picture. There is nothing to corroborate it in the New Testament Scriptures. The New Testament picture is not that of a poor, weak soul, clinging with half-benumbed hands to a cold rock, but of a soul resting in the hands of Christ. But I am afraid the picture is descriptive of too many lives among the followers of Christ. We want less stretch, less strain, less feverishness, more rest. We are not called upon to be always on the rack. It is not demanded of us that our lives should abound in strain. If life is to be fruitful, and increasing in divine knowledge, it must settle down into a more steady rest.

I have often paused at a word in the book of the prophet Ezekiel, in the wonderful passage which portrays the living creatures with the mystic faces and wings: "When they stood, they let down their wings." That last clause expressed the counsel of the psalmist. We need to let down our wings, to check our rapid movements, to "be still."

"Be still and know." How can God give us visions when life is hurrying at a precipitate rate? I have stood in the National Gallery and seen people gallop round the chamber and glance at twelve of Turner's pictures in the space of five minutes. Surely we might say to such trippers, "Be still, and know Turner!" Gaze quietly at one little bit of cloud, or at one branch, or at one wave of the sea, or at one ray of the drifting moon. "Be still, and know Turner!" But God has difficulty in getting us still. That is perhaps why he has sometimes employed the ministry of dreams. Men have had "visions in the night." In the daytime I have a divine visitor in the shape of some worthy thought, or noble impulse, or hallowed suggestion, but I am in such feverish haste that I do not heed it, and pass along. I do not "turn aside to see this great sight," and so I lose heavenly vision. If I would know more of God, I must relax the strain and moderate the pace. I must "be still."

"IF ANY man will do His will, he shall know." That is suggestive of location and outlook. It indicates standing ground and consequent vision.

I was walking one day through a lovely wood in the North Riding of Yorkshire. My vision was bounded by the trees to the right and to the left, and the undergrowth which stretched about my feet on every side. One who knew the wood took me a few paces from the beaten track to a little square of elevated platform, and a woodland panorama stretched before me in bewildering beauty. The native knew the stand ground whence the vision could be obtain And here is another standing ground: "If man will do"; and here is another panoram "he shall know!" I am to stand in the doi and I shall experience the knowing. I am stand in the middle of a deed, and I shall the vantage ground for surveying the thing God.

We have too often looked for visions in midst of arguments. Here we are counseled look for them in the midst of obedience. Go do an act of mercy, and in the midst of the do look around for God, and you shall have vision of his glory. In the life you shall find light, for "light is sown for the righteous." out and try to reclaim a fellow man, and in midst of the saving ministry, look about for Redeemer, and you shall have some vision of glory. Plant your feet in obedience, and yo eyes shall gaze upon the unfolding glories of mind of God. "If any man will do His will, shall know."

"He was known to them in the breaking bread." When was he made known? "In breaking of bread." Then he employed occasion of an ordinary meal to make him known to them.

By ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH

BRIEF is the time for song,
Yet the brown thrush sings,
Careless of winters long
Or of vanished springs.

Grief is the lot of all,
Yet the meadows know
Only when gray rains fall
Will the harvests grow.

Swiftly the years are spanned,
No dreams abide;
But steadfast the great hills stand
Till the stars have died.

Sing then thy song, nor care
If the winter near;
Know that the rains prepare
For the springtime's cheer.

Heed not the dying rose
By the seasons slain;
Fair till eternity's close
Love shall remain!

A HUNDRED YEARS OF HAULING

LIFE on the farm even during the past decade has changed immeasurably. A few of our farmers are inclined to be reactionary, or at least ultra-conservative, and still stick to the ways; we find this type of citizen in all walks of , however, and as a matter of fact the great iority of farm owners have long since determined t it is a matter of better judgment to supplant the h-priced labor and slow-moving four-footed ani-ls of their grandfathers' time with the best of labor- d time-saving equipment.

In prehistoric times man himself was the sole ans of transportation. With a slowly awakening elligence he next captured and tamed certain of wild animals of the earth—the elephant, the slow-ving lethargic ox, and then the horse. On these he dely lashed or hung the few products of those days ich it was necessary to transport. The next ad-ncement in carrying was when some genius of cient Egypt thousands of years ago discovered that beast of burden possessed the power to pull more an it could carry, and so the early-day traffic man-er attached two poles to his ox, on which was ced the load. Our own Indians used this method transportation, and the French voyageurs termed a "travois."

From this crude beginning we can easily trace the bsequent development to the two-wheeled cart; en, progress battling in those days even as now ainst age-old prejudice for that which is known and oven, we come to the comparatively modern four-eeled wagon of happy boyhood memory. More wly and with a greater degree of inherent predilec-on for the things "which were good enough for andfather" to combat, we trace the development to e motor truck and its very recent assistant, the ailer.

It is true that to a large percentage of our farmers ho still maintain that the old way is best, the time-d labor-saving features of the motor truck and ailer have not been sufficiently demonstrated. The dustry is still comparatively young, however, and during the short space of time since its inception there has been too little opportunity for universal demonstration. The war, too, demanded and took heavy toll from the motor-truck industry, and as a result of these combined circumstances the great majority of our land-owners who are operating without the assistance of power do so simply because they lack any concrete knowledge of its possibilities and advantages, and so they must endure for a time the same handicaps under which their grandfathers were forced to labor.

In certain sections of the country progress has too long been halted by the lack of good roads. The tractor and powerful motor truck can, of course, successfully negotiate almost any sort of ground, but the roads which in bad weather are little better than washed out rocky ditches collect a heavy toll in repair and maintenance bills.

ANOTHER thing which has to a certain extent hindered and discouraged the prospective purchaser of motor equipment is the fact that many pioneer buyers of trucks made a serious mistake in that they did so without having first made a careful study of local conditions. They neglected to properly estimate the size of truck best suited to meet their requirements, the character of the highways, and the miscellaneous hauling with which they might supplement their regular loads during the slack season. In consequence of this neglect they found that their trucks did not accomplish the primary purpose for which they were purchased—the reduction in hauling and labor costs. Fortunately the manufacturers have been quick to recognize the undesirability of such a condition, and have remedied it in so far as has been possible by the institution of educational campaigns tending to create a desire on the part of the buyer to make an intelligent study of his needs, and he is assisted in every way possible by the manufacturer to select the equipment most suitable to meet those needs.

The modern farmer need by no means be restricted to markets within a radius of six or seven miles from his home, nor need he limit his day's hauling to the twenty-five-mile limit imposed by the use of a good team.

Many dairymen, truck gardeners, orchardists and others with whom speed is an important factor find that fifty miles a day, with what would have been an impossible load for the old-time team and wagon, may be easily accomplished with a motor truck in less than a day; the volume of product hauled may be still further increased by the addition of a trailer.

ONE outstanding feature of the motor truck as compared to the team and wagon is its dependability; but a few years ago the mired wagon with its floundering horses or mules—and even the powerful oxen were not exempt—was a familiar sight on some of our roads. The driver was usually knee-deep in mud, attempting to fill in the hole and render the spot passable, or else with his shoulder to the wheel was endeavoring to the best of his ability to supplement the meager animal power in extricating the wagon from its difficulties. Today we have but to step on the accelerator—the engine instantly responds to the call for increased power, and, presto! the load is free and bowling along on solid ground at a twenty-mile-an-hour speed.

Nowadays the more progressive among our manufacturers equip their trucks with a winch run by the truck engine, by which means it is possible for the vehicle to haul itself with its own power through any sort of mud-hole or soft ground without great difficulty or loss of much time. In using a trailer over soft roads or up steep hills which the truck alone might be able to negotiate, the winch again comes into use for pulling the trailer through after the truck itself has passed the difficult place.

GARNER PALMER.

Instead of using two-ton trucks to haul loads of 6,000 pounds, the owner of this outfit decided to hitch one-ton trucks to one-ton trailers, thus distributing the weight over eight wheels instead of over four, and making the load easier to pull out of the field

THE VALUE OF BIBLE STUDY

SEVERAL years ago the Christian Herald published a department entitled "Do You Know Your Bible?" It was appreciated by so many of our readers that we decided to arrange, if possible, for a systematic Course of Bible Study on a broader scale, at the earliest opportunity and under capable instructors. Then came the world-war, which interfered seriously with our plans. But with the return of peace we decided to go on with them. These plans are now complete, and at last we are able to make the announcement that a Christian Herald Bible Course, under the leadership of Rev. James M. Gray, D. D., dean of the Moody Bible Institute, of Chicago, will begin in October next. Dr. Gray, with whose writings our readers are already familiar, will have as his associates teachers of long experience in conducting Bible Courses. They represent different evangelical denominations.

The Christian Herald Bible Course, however, will stand in a class by itself. It will call for a weekly lesson during a six months' term, and will be conducted on such simple lines that every student will be able to follow and understand. The Course is open to any subscriber who, along with the renewal of subscription, sends $1 additional for enrolment in the Course. Subscribers so enrolling have the privilege of bringing in another student with them on the same terms. We would urge every one who desires to acquire a better knowledge of the Bible to enroll as a student in the Course.

WORLD-CHANGE

ON BOTH sides of the Atlantic the presses continue to pour out a steady stream of volumes dealing with the absorbing subject of world-change. While some of these books are welcome as additions to the interpretation of prophetic literature and helpful to the student, there are others that cannot be classed in this category, being largely dogmatic and controversial. Learned professors, eminent preachers and able laymen, however, have made notable contributions. Altogether it is a time when thoughtful minds are seeking utterance in a way that proves how deeply the souls of men are stirred by the mighty events now progressing in the world.

An illuminating book which deals with the questions that are being asked by many today is "Between Two Worlds," by John Heston Willey, published by the Association Press, New York. Mr. Willey is not an alarmist. He does not indulge in startling prediction. He discerns in what has befallen the world, the love of God toward men and "the clearing of the field for new and better ventures, and a preparation for nobler modes of life, for sweeter manners, and for purer laws. God has made sundry promises to the universe and to man, and he will keep these promises until every jot and tittle has been fulfilled." Christ's Kingdom had already "come in the hearts of men. It was not to be waited for and watched for and then to break in overwhelming phenomena upon the world. It had already come as the morning comes. It was already working, as leaven works in the measures of meal. The seed was growing silently, surely, growing to the harvest."

He is now revealing to us the largeness of his Kingdom. "He moves in the minds of his mighty angels of science and discovery and invention, in the healing of diseases, the correction of long-standing abuses, the conquering of hunger and hopeless poverty in their strongholds. He has come as a part of history and the maker of new days. His coming is seen in the triumph of the Gospel agencies." The world-war the author interprets not as a sign that the end was near, but as the sign of a new beginning—a new world. "Europe had been poisoned by false ideals, which were a menace to the whole body cosmic. The cancer of autocracy had to be cut out before the world could be safe. . . . It does seem that the Christ who came to bring a sword had appeared at headquarters."

Even before the general upheaval began, and increasingly during its continuance, the leading thinkers of the nations have felt a common impulse to write of the events which could only be regarded as in the nature of prophetic fulfilment. Whitwell Wilson's volume on "The Christ We Forget" was a loud call for a return to Calvary and to the Bible, which had been neglected in the universal struggle for wealth and power and the thousand things of the flesh that drew men away from God and righteousness. Haeckel (since dead) put science aside and made "Eternity" the theme of his latest work, in which he urged men to make their lives "as good and happy as possible . . . and to leave the decision of your fate to that blind chance which rules the universe"—a conclusion which sufficiently demonstrates that, like many others, he had missed the essence of the great spiritual message of the time. While he was groping in the dark, thousands in the trenches were finding the Bible, God, Christ, the Soul and Eternal Life. Our colleges were listening to lecture courses on immortality, and famous investigators were putting forth their various philosophies in the effort to find through scientific channels a solution of the great problem. In the main, they must be regarded as failing to discover three things which have come as a revelation even to simpler minds: that God is dealing with the nations in judgment as he has dealt with them aforetime; that the issues of the great world-war have been divinely directed toward justice and righteousness, and that the old world order has given place to the new, in which there is to be a general revaluation of many things for which men formerly strove and which are now seen to be hindrances to the development of life and character. The message to men is a call not only to a rebirth of faith in God and in his purposes for the race, but to recognition of his rulership, to fuller obedience to his will, and to a broader and more generous service than has yet been known.

PROHIBITION—THUS FAR

"WHEN the worship of Bacchus ceased in the old heathen days, did Olympus put on sackcloth and the people of earth mourn?" asks a reader of this journal. We don't believe the old Greeks were ever on the water wagon. If we may judge of the effect of prohibition, after two months of trial throughout the nation, we would be disposed to say that, like ourselves, the ancients, if they ever tried the experiment in sober earnest, must have been rather surprised and possibly not a little amused at the results. For our first thirty days of dry nationhood reports from a number of states showed a remarkable drop in criminal statistics. Milwaukee experienced a state-wide reduction in drunks and disorderlies, and many other Wisconsin cities had none, to report. In Illinois various kinds of crime decreased, murders excepted, and there was a very remarkable drop in non-support complaints. California had fewer crimes by two-thirds than before prohibition, and in the larger cities arrests for intoxication almost disappeared. Bootlegging was greatly diminished, and thefts and petty offenses were fewer, but there was an increase in suicides. The eight largest cities on the Pacific coast recorded one-third fewer arrests than in the same month a year ago. The San Francisco Bulletin, summing up the situation, observed that "cutting off liquor has done much for the morals of the state." Similarly, in Pennsylvania, the Philadelphia Public Ledger says, "Prohibition is making out an excellent case for itself."

We venture the prediction that the next reports will indicate continuous progress on moral, social and economic lines, all due to the wholesome change which has come in with prohibition.

THE GERMAN CONSTITUTION

THERE is much to commend in the new German constitution, which has been announced after a long period of discussion in the National Assembly. In a very large degree, it is a direct reversal of the former constitution of imperial days. It is made clear in the preamble that the empire is to be a republican state, sovereignty being based on the people, "united and inspired by the will to renew and strengthen its empire in freedom and justice, and to seek inner and outer peace and social advancement." It is noticeable, however, that the National Assembly now gives way to the Reichstag, and also that, while the individual states will have legislative rights, imperial law will supersede these when occasion arises. The different states each have a liberal constitution, the legislatures being elected by general ballot, with equal suffrage for both sexes. Prussia's power is reduced and all of her special privileges taken away. Members of the Reichstag will hold office for four years. The president will be chosen by the whole German people, instead of by the Reichstag, and will be elected for a term of seven years. Chancellor and cabinet members will be appointed by the president. The chancellor will decide questions of foreign policy and will bear responsibility for the cabinet. The Reichstag is invested with the power of impeaching president, chancellor and cabinet on proper charges.

There are in the powers given to the federal government some that carry a strong reminder of the old empire. An Imperial Council is created, with limited powers. The constitution as a whole, however, may be regarded as a conservative outcome for the new departure which stamps Germany; for the time being at least, as an avowed republican nation, in w every citizen of an individual state is a citizen o whole, with equal rights in all respects, and w freedom of discussion through voice and press is mitted. In a word, more rights and privileges in line of real republicanism are recognized and g anteed in the new constitution than Germany in past has ever granted to its people.

It is a clean-cut, comprehensive, businesslike d ment. At last it would seem that Germany, ta counsel of common sense, accepts the new world o and is democratizing herself with a good gr Hohenzollernism may still have its partisans in new republic, but it is evident that the nation, whole does not regret the passing of the old Prus autocracy.

PREACHER FOR THE TIMES

CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who have enjo the sermons of that eminent minister of G Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, in the pages of t paper in past years will be glad to learn that Campbell Morgan is coming to locate in the Uni States. As pastor of Westminster Congregatio Chapel in London, his pulpit utterances in war-ti have been heard around the world. He is a fearl and arousing preacher—a prophet for the times.

Dr. Morgan is already well known in this count and will be welcomed, should he plan to stay h indefinitely. His pulpit utterances are always spirational and helpful. He has the rare art of k ting his audience together as one, and of carry them with him in closest sympathy wherever thoughts may lead. He knows, too, the value o change of audience; for, with possibly a few exc tions in a generation, a preacher who in these event days is so prolific that he can go on from year to y without repeating himself is hard to find.

Knowing our country and people, and being famil with American institutions and an ardent admi of them, Dr. Morgan is assured of a cordial welcon We look forward to having his sermons occasiona in the Christian Herald.

THE PRESIDENT'S PLEA

IN PUTTING himself at the service of the Sena Foreign Relations Committee for a conference the White House on the Peace Treaty, Preside Wilson set up a brand-new precedent. With enti frankness he submitted to their questioning, reply to all with perfect candor and baring his soul to g them the information they wanted. It was though he were on the witness stand undergoing cross-fire of questions. Here was one man, the he of the nation, laying aside for the moment all t authority and privilege of his high position, answe ing with entire good nature and with wonderful co pleteness the interrogations of seventeen Senator

It was made clear, at the beginning of this uniq gathering, that the prime object which Preside Wilson had in view was to point out the consequenc that might be reasonably expected to arise if actio on the Treaty should be seriously delayed. In h opening statement to the Senators he discussed o by one the various points that had been raised i the last few months in criticism of the Treaty. H told them that in the composition of the Leag Covenant every suggestion of the United States we accepted. The Monroe Doctrine, he said, is expressl left unimpaired. Articles X and XVI were also ex plained and various doubts as to their meaning cleared up. He assured his guests that, under th Covenant, each government was free to accept o reject League decisions, and each and all had th undisputed right of withdrawal from the League. I all cases, he was careful to point out, the obligatio imposed by the League upon its members is purely moral one. There is nothing obligatory about it Even the unanimous vote of the League on an question is simply advisory. He did not oppos interpretations, but in view of what he had alread explained he considered it unnecessary to embod them in the instrument of ratification.

Then he pleaded that the Treaty be ratified withou changes, as these would necessarily involve still fur ther delays by other governments which were ex pectantly awaiting our action. Delay was not onl causing uncertainty in Europe and postponing th final settlements of peace, but it was seriously em barrassing business here.

How the Senators themselves were impressed th country will soon know. Meanwhile, all depend upon the wisdom of their judgment, now that th responsibility for further delays has been squarel laid where it belongs.

APPERSON

"The Eight With Eighty Less Parts"

As people study the Model 1920 Apperson they discover that it is no sudden inspiration, but a natural outgrowth. The Apperson Brothers began making motor cars in 1893.

The Apperson purpose was to do the right thing first. They meant to lead. They succeeded.

Early in the development of the industry they produced the first double-opposed motor; the first car with float feed carburetor; the first car with electric ignition.

Apperson — first! An Apperson won the first American speed contest. An Apperson made the first 100-mile non-stop run. An Apperson made the first overland tour. For twenty-six years it has been Apperson — first!

From the early days down to more recent times when the Apperson stamp was placed on the first Chummy Roadster and the Eight with Eighty Less Parts, the Apperson Brothers were satisfied only when they were pioneering.

So it is only logical that this Model 1920 Apperson rushes in high, with a gliding acceleration, from 1 to 40 miles an hour in 20 seconds —

Drops from 40 miles an hour to a standstill in 4 seconds — 40 yards —

Whirls about in a 38¼-foot circle—and this is a 130-inch wheelbase car —

Shows the speed of the Jack Rabbit racers of other days with a tire and gasoline mileage hitherto unknown in cars of this power and size.

For your certainty in securing the most car for your investment — drive an Apperson first — then decide.

Both the Model 1920 and the Anniversary are in readiness at your dealer's.

THE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEE

Treaty "Interpretations" Doomed

THE long-awaited meeting of President Wilson and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations for the discussion of the treaty of peace with its League of Nations Covenant had only one effect on the peace situation, if all reports from Washington can be accepted as correct. The President offered a compromise in the form of "interpretations" which should not be written in the resolution of ratification. The Republican senators, supported by a group of six to eight Democrats, have definitely rejected the proposal, and all efforts now will be centered on a program which will call for "reservations," if not for out-and-out amendments.

The White House conference, in many respects the most momentous in the history of the country, continued for three hours. During this time the President was cross-examined by the keenest legal minds in the Senate, and the questioning brought out the fact that in Mr. Wilson's opinion the League Covenant's Article X, which binds the United States to go to the aid of any member of the League whose territory or independence is threatened, is only "morally" binding. He reverted several times to his statement that there is no legal obligation involved, but he agreed that a moral force at times is more compelling than a legal force.

While the President talked freely and answered most questions with no apparent resevation, he declined to discuss some features of the Japanese settlement and the protests that have been made to him by members of the American peace mission against the award of Shantung and some of the Pacific Islands to Japan. He declared the secret treaties, involving all the Allied powers, were unknown to him until the Peace Conference work was under way.

As an outcome of the White House meeting, and to bring the President's ideas directly before the Senate, Senator Pittman, Administration supporter, submitted, in the form of a resolution independent of the ratification resolution, four "interpretative reservations." These include a provision for a withdrawal from the League on two years' notice, a declaration that the obligations involved in Article X can only be carried out "through the voluntary separate action of each of the respective governments," a provision for national control of internal questions, and a restatement of the American attitude on the Monroe Doctrine. Republican senators, heretofore regarded as more or less friendly to the President's policy, immediately announced their opposition to the Pittman resolution and provided a clear-cut line-up of a strong majority in favor of drastic reservations to be a part of the formal ratification.

More Trouble for Peacemakers

THE most serious dispute among the Allies since the questions of the Adriatic and Japanese claims were acute, has arisen over the establishment by England of a protectorate over Persia. The negotiations which led to British action were so quietly conducted that no inkling of them reached other diplomatists, although for two years a careful watch had been kept on Persian affairs. Suddenly England announced the consummation of a treaty which gave to her financial and military control of Persia. The effect on France was electric, and immediately the entire French press began publication of violently denunciatory articles. Liberal Persians who were watching their national interests at the Peace Conference joined in the chorus. Just what is the attitude of the Shah is uncertain, but he is traveling to Switzerland, and diplomatists in Paris insist his purpose is to place himself in close touch with the Peace Conference, or the embryo League of Nations, and attempt to have recognition of the agreement by the League voted down. Diplomatic circles, however, believe the League must approve the treaty, since its signature antedates the establishment of the League and its machinery. L'Echo de Paris prints the text of the agreement and comments: "Nowhere is a formal protectorate mentioned . . . but the substance of the agreement will fool no one." France is particularly concerned because the interests for which she is trying to force recognition in Syria.

Lloyd George's Speech

PREMIER LLOYD GEORGE, appearing before the House of Commons on the day of adjournment, delivered a prepared speech dealing with economic questions and the future industrial policy of the government. He ignored the acute Irish problem, which the public generally expected him to discuss. While not pessimistic, the premier sounded a grave note of warning to the country to produce more and buy less if Great Britain is to keep in the race for world trade, or even save its own economic life. From the labor side the speech aroused great indignation because of the announcement that the government had decided against nationalization of the coal mines. This was one of the vital points in the agreement with labor, which was contained in the so-called Sankey report. "Direct action" by the miners, railway and transport workers is threatened. The newspapers condemn the premier's failure to recognize extravagance and waste in government departments, and the lack of a concrete reconstruction policy. A sharp fight on the government is under way.

Bishop Brent Demands Trial

THE Right Rev. Charles Henry Brent, Protestant Bishop of Western New York, has asked to be placed on trial at the triennial convention of the church which opens in Detroit, October 12. Bishop Theodore Rogers Graves, temporarily in charge of the church work in the Philippines, accuses two clergymen in mission work of practices which do not conform to the church doctrine. These practices comprise "the perpetual reservation of the Blessed Sacrament and the burning of the light before it" and the singing of the "Ave Maria," together with the burning of candles and the offering of flowers before the image of the Virgin. Bishop Brent assumes responsibility for the practices of the clergy for the reason that he was in charge in the Philippines when the missions were started.

Restricting Immigration

THE House Committee on Immigration, after several months' work, has submitted a measure to restrict all immigration for a period of two years. Following the two-year period, the measure provides for the assimilation of all newcomers by compelling them to make a statement at their port of entry of their intention to become citizens, and requires the immigrant to learn English and to take out papers of naturalization within three years on penalty of deportation. A clause would permit six months' temporary residence within the country.

Promised Korean Reforms

THE Japanese government has made public an imperial rescript announcing the abolition of the military administration in Korea and the substitution of a civil administration. Distinctions between Koreans and Japanese, it says, will be obliterated and a system of provincial and municipal government will be instituted similar to that in operation in Japan proper. The imperial authorities blame the Korean revolution for the delay in the announcement of the reforms. Appointment of two civilians, Baron Saito and Mr. Midzuni, to the posts of governor-general and director-general of administration removes the military element from direct control of Korean affairs. Observers in Tokyo insist that the outcry which was heard all over the world against the treatment of the Korean natives in revolt against the Japanese military was largely responsible for the decision to reorganize the colonial government. The largely augmented garrison, however, will be maintained for some time.

Two Years Ago and Today

The story of a remarkable storage battery invention and what it is doing for Motorists

In the fall of 1917 readers of national magazines read about a new Willard, a Still Better Willard, a Willard with an entirely new idea in battery construction—Threaded Rubber Insulation.

The Still Better Willard was not an experiment—for two years before the announcement a car builder put it on 35,000 cars. Many of those first Willard Batteries with Threaded Rubber Insulation are still in use after four years.

What is the Secret of Threaded Rubber Success?

Insulation had always been the big problem with any storage battery. Ordinary materials wore out before the battery plates did. Re-insulation was bound to come sooner or later, and when insulation began to break down the plates were injured.

But Willard, for the first time found a practical way to use rubber, the one ideal insulating material, by piercing each rubber insulator with 196,000 tiny threads to permit passage of the electrolyte.

You ought to be posted on batteries and battery insulation, so that when you need a new battery you'll be sure of the best your money can buy.

Get the booklets "The Wick of the Willard" and "A Mark with a Meaning for You" from the nearest Willard Service Station.

This is the Post-War Maxwel

THE Great War had an asset side. It made engineers keener. It taught new things about automobiles. Many of the great improvements made in car design during the war period may now be found in the Post-War Maxwell.

Note these:

1. A new type front axle (Elliott) which gives a castering effect to steering.

2. A new type rear axle — heavier, and makes the car cling to the road.

3. A finished electric system; well nigh faultless.

4. A larger radiator with more pleasing lines.

5. New design full crown fenders with wire e forcing.

6. Gas tank now in the rear; vacuum feed.

7. Larger service brakes; emergency brake now mission—European type.

8. Engine efficiency increased to new point by of Hot Spot and Ram's-horn.

9. Two-bulb headlights, decreasing draw on battery; steering post more rigid; warning button of wheel; all switches and buttons grouped in a si

Resurrection Power

SUNDAY. Eph. 1 : 19–20. "His power to usward, . . . the mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead." Here is a quaint saying of that rare genius John Paterson Struthers: "Isn't it like God—sending an earthquake to loosen the prisoners' bonds and break the jailer's heart? An exuberance of power—doing as much for a good man and a bad man as he had done at the resurrection of his dear Son." Yes, this is like God. And it is this wonderful thing that constantly inspires the song in the early apostolic life. The apostles steadfastly believed that the marvelous power which worked in the life and death and resurrection of Jesus Christ was the power which also worked in them.

And so this was the great secret of apostolic assurance. They never saw their difficulties standing alone, towering in threatening detachment from everything else. They saw them alongside the power which had defied the powers of hell, and broken the tyranny of death, and opened the gates of the tomb. They did not know the word "impossible." Nothing was impossible. They were more than conquerors in Christ, who loved them and gave himself for them. The apostles fearlessly measured their tasks, and then they sent their eyes roaming over the immeasurable fields of grace. They did not turn for their supplies to a cistern but to the overflowing fulness of the eternal springs. And so they went forward to their tasks with triumphant confidence. They believed that in the risen Christ they had a power by which they could move mountains into the sea, and with a faith like that they thrilled to the challenge of even the mightiest necessity. They knew that the big problems would reveal new stores of grace. When they went forth to a task they went out to see a miracle.

This was the secret of apostolic joy. For it is in the mood of sacred assurance that the bird in the soul begins to sing. "I can do all things in Christ." That is the confidence that wakens the bird and loosens his song. Fear silences our song as the song of the bird is silenced when a hawk is in the sky. "Faith is the assurance of things hoped for." That faith gives songs in the night. It inspires songs of victory even by the open grave. Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. J. H. J.

More Than Conquerors

MONDAY. Rom. 8 : 37. "Nay, in these things, we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us." Herbert Spencer, in the preface to his "Data of Ethics," affirms that Christianity is too ambitious for humanity; that it holds up before us an impracticable ideal. Is the Bible indeed too ambitious for us? It would seem that God is not satisfied to have his children mere conquerors; he wants us to be more than conquerors. He is like a father who wants his son to graduate with honors, with high honors, with highest honors. Jesus affirmed that he came that we might have life more abundantly. A very popular shop in the neighborhood of a large city school is called "The Bit-More Shop," from the fact that the proprietor has a way of giving each purchaser a little more than the amount of his purchase calls for.

That is the secret of the success of the enterprise. Christianity is the "much-more faith." Recall Paul's abundant figures. "More than conquerors" is one of many such expressions. What is it to be more than a conqueror? Is it not to conquer for others than ourselves? Great discoverers are more than conquerors. The first patient who submitted to chloroform, and went to sleep not knowing whether he would ever awake, conquered pain for us. The soul that bears distress patiently is brave, but he who bears it joyfully is more than a conqueror. He who suffers solitude without complaint has fortitude, but one who, like Thoreau, turns the solitude of the wilderness into manifold inspiration is more than a conqueror. The conqueror of poverty makes his poverty a source of moral wealth, of spiritual revenue, and so he conquers for others than himself. The Psalmist wrote, "My cup runneth over." An overflowing cup seems like needless waste, but it is not, for the overflow of blessing from our cups is that with which the world is blessed. C. C. A.

Likemindedness

TUESDAY. Rom. 12 : 16. "Of the same mind one toward another." In the early Church there was doubtless variety. Each little group that met for worship had its own problems, its own hopes and joys. Paul did not write to Corinth where the trouble was sensuality as he wrote to Galatia where there was ritualism, or to Philippi where he had no fault to find. He did not treat every church alike; he allowed for individuality; but, on the other hand, he declared that all were one in Christ Jesus. The Corinthian and Galatian and Philippian must greet one another as brethren, not as rivals and parties.

Even in the upper room at Jerusalem, the Church, though small in numbers, included all sorts and conditions of people. A well-to-do woman like Mary of Magdala, doubtless accompanied by Joanna and Susannah, who were ladies from Herod's court, associated intimately with Mary, the widow of a carpenter. Nicodemus and his friend Joseph of Arimathea, though members of the Sanhedrin, accepted the leadership of fishermen like Peter and John. Simon the Zealot consorted with Matthew the publican. As the Church grew, so were these contrasts multiplied. Beggars who had been cripples worshiped side by side with landlords who had sold their estates. Onesimus, the runaway Phrygian slave, was pardoned by Philemon, the master whom he had defrauded. A jailer bathed the wounds inflicted by him on his convicts. A tentmaker in chains preached to members of Cæsar's household and to the courtiers of the Asmonean prince Aristobulus. Yet through it all they managed to be "of one accord," "of one mind." They had not so much the same ritual or ceremonies as the same love, working in the one body, through one faith, toward one hope, by one baptism, toward one Lord and Father of all. P. W. W.

The Unfruitful Vine

WEDNESDAY. John 15 : 2. "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, he taketh it away. and every branch that beareth fruit, he cleanseth it, that it may bring forth more fruit. A fruitless vine is the most useless thing in nature. It is not good for firewood, furniture, building purposes or beauty. A tree may be all these without fruit. The vine must bear fruit through its branches or it will become a complete failure.

When a branch fails, it is burned or buried. When dead portions are cut out, the living branches are purged that they may bring forth more fruit. We should not shrink at the pruning-knife when held in the Gardener's hands. He will sustain you, however deep the knife may go. First, the union, then the pruning and purging. It is not the old wood that bears the fruit, but the new growth. The old must be cut back that the new may be fully developed. If the branches could feel and speak, perhaps we would hear, "Why am I troubled so? Haven't I done my best in leafing out, spreading, bearing lustrous bunches for others to eat?" But the lord of the garden would reply, "True, but your large and multiplied growth of branches, your riches and accumulation, hinder the production. You must be cut back to smaller branches, fewer leaves for richer clusters."

The disciplining and cleansing are always for larger fruit-bearing. A vineyard in California, after the pruning, to a stranger looks like a lot of little good-for-nothing stumps, but the harvest time tells a story of rich and beautiful treasure. Results are what the world demands. Much fruit glorifies the husbandman and is proof of discipleship. Nothing but leaves and branches in the church vine speaks of formalism and culture without the vital life and power. The words of the Master would be, "Cut it down. Why cumbereth it the ground?" E. W. C.

The Far-Away Look

THURSDAY. II Cor. 4 : 17. "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." This is the secret of a happy life. In these troublous times it solves the problems of history by enabling us to read between the lines. Otherwise our hearts would fail us, like that of the young man in Dothan who, seeing the city invested by a hostile army, exclaimed, "Master, we are lost! What shall we do?" And the prophet prayed, "O Lord, open his eyes that he may see!" Whereupon the novice cried, "Master, the mountains are full of the Lord's horses and chariots!"

It is for lack of the far-away look that we fail also to interpret providence in our personal lives. It was a rule among the epic poets that no incident should be brought into the narrative which did not contribute to the denouement. This was called the rule of the dramatic unities. A like rule is discernible in the divine watch-care. It is obvious, however, that one who reads only a page at a time sees life as a tangled skein. The man who in the midst of his vicissitudes perceives that time is only the preface of an endless serial, and that prosperity and adversity are warp and woof of a royal garment with which he is to be clothed forever, speaks no more of threads and thrums, but recognizing the dramatic unities, rejoices that "all things work together for good to them that love God."

One of the ancient poets tells of two doubters who agreed that whichever of them passed on was to return and enlighten the other. One night, while mourning the death of his comrade, the survivor heard above the wind the patter of a horse's hoofs and the words, "These things are true." The fable touches close on fact. "Here we know in part and see as in a glass darkly," but there we shall understand the relative importance of material and spiritual things. D. J. B.

Record unparalleled in Tire History proves Dayton Airless $99\frac{6}{10}\%$ Perfect

Our fiscal year has just ended. A new page of tire history has been written.

An amazing record of uninterrupted, air-free, care-free, trouble-proof, delay-proof mileage has been made that revolutionizes all standards of tire service.

Dayton Airless have seen service that would wreck ordinary tires:

—on passenger cars and trucks,
—through the muddy roads of the middle west,
—over the rocky trails of the mountains,
—through the alleys of cities.
—over icy streets and frozen roads,
—across burning desert sands.

Ruts and stones could not break them.

Tacks, nails and broken glass could not stop them.

They have made a surpassing score on Fords overloaded with passengers; they have carried oil in Oklahoma, groceries in Chicago, dry goods in New York, paint in Baltimore, lumber in Michigan; they have faithfully served stores, families, farms and factories;

—without one minute's delay for repairs,
—without back-breaking pumping,
—without tedious patching,
—without vexing changes of tires.

And with all this wearing, tearing service only $\frac{4}{10}$ of one per cent. of thousands and thousands and thousands bought by owners of Fords, Maxwells & Chevrolets have come back for adjustment.

Now, Dayton Airless are guaranteed 8000 miles.

Records have shown 2, 3 and 4 times that mileage.

If you would spend your money wisely, buy Dayton Airless. It's true economy.

You'll save tire-repair bills for there will be no repairs.

You'll save time for there will be no delays.

You'll save energy for there will be no tires to change.

CATCHING THE VILLAGE SINNE

By ALBERT SIDNEY GREGG

OLD Pete Hanks was the village blacksmith and the untamed Philistine of Hardinville. As a blacksmith he was a success, but as a saint he had many miles yet to travel. He was personally popular, except among the church folks, who had long ago surrendered him to certain damnation. Every time a new minister came to the village there was a little flutter of hope that perhaps he would save Pete from his evil ways, but the ministers in turn usually left him to his own devices after the first interview.

Then Arthur Livingstone came, and Hardinville was all agog with expectancy. The new minister was young and inexperienced. Hardinville was his first appointment. His predecessors had been elderly men, intolerant, set in their opinions, and quick to offend the blacksmith because of their lack of adaptability. Livingstone had been carefully informed as to the character of Old Pete and the desire of the church to capture him, and laid his plans accordingly.

He did not rush the job. He waited until he had held a few services, and won the good will of the community. Then one afternoon, when there was nobody else about Pete's shop, Livingstone made the long-expected first call.

As Livingstone approached, Old Pete paused, closed his thin lips, lowered his shaggy gray eyebrows over his steel-blue eyes, sniffed, and braced himself for the attack.

Livingstone, with a genial smile on his lips and a twinkle in his dark eyes, stepped up briskly and held out his hand.

'How do you do, Mr. Hanks? I am Arthur Livingstone, the new minister of the Hardinville church, and I have called to get acquainted."

Pete sniffed, moved from one foot to the other, scratched his stubbly chin, and surveyed Livingstone silently for a few seconds without offering to take the hand of the preacher.

"Hand's dirty. Can't shake," he replied shortly. "Besides, I am busy."

"Then I'll shake for you," responded Livingstone heartily, as he clasped his own hands together and shook them.

Old Pete turned uneasily to his bench, picked up a small bolt, fingered it a moment, glanced at Livingstone and blurted out:

"I reckon you've come round to see if you could save my soul from hell——"

"Just cut that out!" exclaimed Livingstone with a laugh. "We'll not bother about religion. Besides, I can't save anybody from hell. If a man wants to go to hell that's his business and not mine. I want you for a friend, if you don't mind."

Old Pete started in surprise. He forgot about his work and laid the bolt down on the bench.

"What kind of a minister be ye, anyway?" he asked slowly. "All that have been here before you always warned me about goin' to hell, and got out in a hurry. They seemed to be afeard if they acted like human folks they might get scorched. Now you are different. You tell me I can go to hell if I feel like it. And then you ask for my friendship. What does the friendship of an old geezer like me amount to for a young fellow like you?"

"It means a lot," responded Livingstone earnestly. "You have seen more of life than I have, and you can help me by just being my friend."

"If I am your friend will I have to jine yer church?"

"No. Just do as you please about that."

"Can I work on Sunday, and go huntin' and fishin', and kin I set in at a poker game onct in a while?"

"That's for you to decide."

Pete looked at Livingstone long and searchingly, and then spoke:

"Your offer is fair, and ye can count on me. Everybody knows that I am a man of my word."

"Let's shake on it, then."

Pete quickly wiped his hand on an old cloth, and grasped the outstretched hand of his young friend. They gripped in silence, and then Pete leaned back against his bench, arms folded, as if waiting for Livingstone to speak.

They talked for a long time. Livingstone told Pete all about his family, and what he hoped to do in the world, and Pete gave the young minister some choice inside information about the other sinners of the village. Among his rather advanced ideas Livingstone told Pete that he wanted to advertise his sermon subject with a bulletin at the postoffice, whereupon Pete exclaimed:

"Just the thing. When I was a youngster just startin' out I had a hankerin' to be a painter, but I had to make money quick, so I learned to shoe horses and mend wagons. All the same, I learned a bit about makin' plain signs, and once in a while I make them yet. Tell me what you want put on it, and I'll try my luck for you makin' a sign for the church."

And thus they formed their singular compact.

Pete was not satisfied with one bulletin. He made signs announcing the coming sermon subject on big cards in red, black, blue and yellow, and stuck them up at the interurban station, at the horse shed, and in the window of Martin's store.

Everybody of course knew what the preacher was going to talk about, and the people came in from miles around.

Although Pete did not attend any of the services himself, it pleased him to hear that his advertising was effective. By degrees he stopped Sunday work, gave up hunting and fishing on Sunday, got a front seat on the water wagon, and quit playing poker, all of which gratified the church people.

For a year Livingstone was steadily successful. Then he fell in love with Grace Hardin, only daughter of Judge Hardin, president of his board of trustees, and leading member of the church.

They met in a most unexpected way at Old Pete's shop.

Grace had been away attending school, and had never met Livingstone. She was about twenty, fair, with light hair, and dressed in white. Her immaculate costume was strangely out of place in the grimy blacksmith shop. As they chatted together Livingstone was deeply impressed with the perfect understanding that seemed to exist between the girl and Old Pete. He called her "Grace" like he was addressing a little girl, and she in turn called him Uncle Pete. Livingstone knew that Judge Hardin and Pete were bitter enemies, but he did not ask any questions. However, the village gossips gave him hints now and then, and he gathered that it was a long standing quarrel about a woman when they were young men. Livingstone and Grace became interested in each other at the very outset, and thereafter frequently met at the forge. It was a much more congenial place than the big gloomy home of Judge Hardin, although Livingstone called there at intervals to talk with the old judge. Grace's mother was dead. A housekeeper looked after the comforts of the judge, and Grace took care of herself.

Old Pete saw the ripening of love between the young people, smiled, nodded, and quietly helped matters along. He had a little room in the back of the shop where he painted the signs used to advertise the church services, and he contrived on numerous occasions to have Grace come in when Livingstone was there and give them her ideas. And the girl was not only willing, but became enthusiastic about the advertising campaign.

Judge Hardin, also, had noted the growth of affection between the minister and his daughter, but he did not entirely approve. When Livingstone hesitatingly spoke to the judge about the matter, the judge deliberately adjusted his gold-mounted eye-glasses, looked the young man over critically for a moment, and then declared himself:

"In most ways you are all right, and would make a good husband for Grace," he said with judicial deliberation, "but there is one important question I want you to answer. How do you expect to support a wife? You certainly can't do it on the salary you are getting here?"

"We have talked that all over," responded Livingstone eagerly, "and we expect to wait. In a year or two I'll be promoted, possibly to a city church, where I will receive a much larger salary. Then we can afford to get married."

"Your plan is all right," resumed the judge, "but you are heading wrong to realize it. Let me be perfectly frank. You are a promising young man, but there are some things you must learn in order to win promotion. You must acquire poise and dignity. You are too open and democratic in your relations with people. You are making yourself too common."

Livingstone's face flushed as he exclaimed:

"That's the way I am building up my church here. It seems to me the right way. My people have warm hearts, and the poise and reserve you advocate would drive them away."

"Yes, but what have you got? Very few of the really influential men of the community. If you expect to handle a city church, you must know how to enlist the men who have money. Get the men with money and the rest will be easy. Men of affairs want dignity and poise in the minister. Furthermore, by a change of manner you will attract more of the common people. It is a mistake to think you can win common folks by being common just like them. The common people want a minister that they can look up to—a man who lives apart from their common lives."

Livingstone resented the way Judge Hardin had put it, but he was forced to admit that there was some truth in what the older man had said.

After thinking the matter over he decided to attend a gathering of ministers near Boston, who met there for study and conference. There he came into contact with carefully nurtured dignity, poise and reserve on every hand. Occasionally his native democracy of feeling would cause him to forget his surroundings, but one horrified stare from his associates would bring him to his senses with a jolt.

While he did not acquire the degree of "poise" that a city church demanded, he managed to get just enough to spoil him for Hardinville. It manifested itself in the absence of his sunny smile, in his da ate way of walking, and in his very precise ciation.

The change in his manner was detected inst by his friends in Hardinville, and they looke sorrowfully and shook their heads.

He told Grace all about it, and she very vigor opposed his plan.

"You are making a fool of yourself," she excla hotly. "You are not acting natural, and no man succeed by imitating some other man."

But Livingstone did not heed.

Soon after his return he came face to face Ole Pete on the street. In the manner of their friendship Pete began:

"You are a fine one not to come around and an old friend after bein' away for six weeks. Wh the matter——"

"There is nothing the matter, Mr. Hanks. It very fine day, isn't it?"

Old Pete glared. Then his eyes flashed with

"So that's what hit ye," he exclaimed with bi scorn. "Got an attack of dignity, eh? Don't k yer old friends? Let me tell y', young man, pride ambition will send a man to hell quicker than hu and fishin' on Sunday, and don't y' fergit it. could have saved me from hell, but I don't bel anybody could save you now. Good-by until meet again—down below."

Turning on his heel the old blacksmith strode aw

On the next Sunday Pete worked in the forenc hunted and fished in the afternoon, played poke the evening, drank a lot of whisky between tim and had an all-round fight before bedtime.

A few days later the minister received a mess from the blacksmith.

"Come and see me. I'm sick," it read.

As rapidly as his poise would permit him Livi stone responded to the call. He found Pete hudd up in a rocking-chair, his face white and drawn, his eyes burning with a strange light.

"Good evening, Mr. Hanks. Are you ill?" as the minister, carefully modulating his tone a studiously maintaining his poise.

"Rot!" retorted Pete savagely.

"Oh, ah——"

"Sit down and don't move until I get thro with you."

"Ah, yes——"

"Yes, I am sick—sick at heart. The only thi that will do me any good is to give you a good roa ing. There now, don't squirm. You deserve a tannin and as sure as my name is Pete Hanks I am goi to give it to you, if I have to sit on y' while I ma y' listen. Now hear me—I've seen too much not know when pride and ambition are about to ru a pretty good fellow. You have made a plumb ass yerself, but it ain't too late now to back track. Wh y' came here y' were green enough fer the cows eat. Y' asked fer my friendship and I give it to Now y' go daown t' Boston to attend some fool co ference, and come back with an addled head. It enough to make anybody sick—your fool ambition——"

Pete paused for breath.

"Have you had a doctor yet?" asked Livingston trying to turn the conversation.

"No, and if you'll come to yer senses I'll not ne one, either."

"What shall I do?"

"Be natural, and stop bein' a fool——"

Livingstone sat looking at Old Pete's face. The eyes met. In that glance Livingstone read the hea of his companion. Old Pete was hungry for the former relationship of friendship and sympath Livingstone's eyes fell, his face flushed and in th flush his poise failed him. He buried his face in h hands and sat for some moments in deep though When he raised his eyes again they shone with th old-time joy and frankness, and an expression unutterable contentment lighted the countenance Old Pete.

Old Pete held out his hand, and Livingstone claspe it, as he exclaimed a little unsteadily:

"Pete, I've been a fool. I am unworthy of you friendship. Will you forgive me?"

"Sure I will. I know how it feels myself. Now just forget it."

"I must make a clean breast of it," continued th young minister impetuously. "You know Grac Hardin and I are interested in each other——"

"Yes, of course. Everybody knows it—go on."

"And I—we want to get married—but the salary here is not large enough—and I have been trying t fit myself for a larger church, where I could get mor money—and I thought it would help me to acquir what the big preachers call poise——"

"And a fine monkey you have made of yoursel trying to be somebody else. Grace is badly cut up over your conduct. She's been in several times to se me, so I jest fixed up this little scheme to get y' h here and roast the foolishness out of y'."

"Then you are not really sick?"

Romance in Home Life

By Mrs. CHARLES M. SHELDON

A FRIEND said to me not long ago, "My husband and I have agreed to make the last years of our life together the best of all." Her face was illuminated as she spoke, and I thought how beautiful it would be if more husbands and wives would agree to do this. Perhaps many do find their greatest happiness together after the toil and stress of life is not so great. We know it should be so, if their love has grown with the years; but we all know husbands and wives who have grown apart, with the romance of life all gone, all the little courtesies left behind in the years that have gone, trudging along together in a careless, indifferent way, with the stamp of it all on their faces.

Probably no one could tell just when the romance walked away or whose fault it was. Years of care and self-denial in getting the home and caring for the children, disappointments, shattered ideals, careless habits and a host of other things test one's love and promises; married life certainly gives us a chance to show the kind of stuff we are made of.

Some wives make the care of home and children their greatest concern, lavishing on them all their strengt affection, forgetting poor Daddy sire for comradeship. A man lov children, but if he is a real ma that a wife should prize, he something more than a housekeep nurse for his children. More tha woman has asked how she can me demands made upon her and b ideal companion. Well, I think the biggest and most wonderful lege and task in the world to be wife and mother and make success as both, for you not only yourself to keep fit but your hu to teach unselfishness and your ch thoughtfulness.

Oh, how I admire the man wh to it that when, "mother" spea children are to respond to her r quickly; mother is not to be kept ing, there is no doubt in the mi those children as to whether m and dad agree about things.

It is natural for a woman to lov admire her champion. She feel strength and leans upon it as he her over the hard places, making i sible for her to keep her sweetnes graciousness and charm and so hol affection to the end.

Play We Call Dangerous

By SARAH J. WILSON

SEVERAL days ago I was helping some children build a bonfire in a back yard. As we poked the fire the pieces of charred paper flew up in the air, rising higher and higher. The children watched them with a great deal of interest, calling them "birds," "airplanes," and so on. Finally one boy asked, "What makes them go up?" "Because hot air always goes up," I answered, "and it carries the paper with it." These simple facts satisfied him for the time being. Further experience with the same material will bring forth more "whys," and more important facts will be learned and remembered, because they come out of actual experiences.

There are a number of activities that are especially attractive to every boy and girl, but which are also a special source of anxiety to every mother. They are those classed as "dangerous": tree-climbing, swimming, making bonfires and playing with hammer and nails, knives, saws and firearms. I believe this list includes practically all the occupations that are most dear to the hearts of children, particularly boys. And yet, if they have a chance to indulge in them at all it is usually against the wish or perhaps the direct orders of their parents.

Now stop a moment and consider the unquestionable values that lie in all these plays. Physical strength and self-reliance come through swimming and tree-climbing; industrial skill and ability to think and carry out one's ideas are developed by the use of hammers, saws and like tools; and physical and chemical facts are only a small part of the value to be derived from bonfire and firearms.

Of course, we can not overlook the fact that such plays are dangerous. How are we going to meet the children's natural demand for them and at the same time eliminate the danger? In absolutely prohibiting all experiment with "dangerous" playthings the children generally take advantage of some opportunity to evade us and follow their own irresistible inclinations. Even if serious accidents from lack of adult supervision do not happen, it will be granted that the moral results of such evasion of "the law" are undesirable.

I believe a much better way of dealing with the situation is to cooperate with the children in the gratification of their very natural desire to touch and work with things, and to help them carry out their plans. If the parent, teacher, or adult playmate once really gets the children's viewpoint it will make a great difference and wi much to solve this difficult pro Enter into the children's play, an stead of constraint and fear bring new enthusiasm and interest th the greater knowledge you posse facts and conditions. In this way will guard against accidents at the set by being present to show the dren "how," and to explain danger remind them once in a while about careful. Thus you will unconsci avoid the mistake of making the dren feel that they are watched, t ment very galling to any one w learning self-dependence.

One great value of this attitu that you gain your child's confi and can count on his attention obedience with regard to certai strictions which you may feel shou imposed, such as not to light a or build a fire unless he asks you Best of all, the children soon lea be as careful as the most particular could wish. Did you ever watch a climb a tree who has acquired skill self-reliance through such helpful t ing? He knows well enough tha must hold tight, avoid dead limbs be careful where he puts his feet.

Will you not feel more confident procedure of this kind that the chil will be able to meet and conquer difficulties and experiences and you trust in your sympathetic interes make them want to come to you in of need and in the ideals you const hold before them to strengthen guard them from harm? Your re will come in the self-reliance, n strength, and increased knowledg your children, in their keen intere the things in the world about them, in their real confidence in you.

FOREIGN

Harvest in Bohemia. Dispatches of August 19 from Vienna reported harvests in Czechoslovakia sufficient to supply the needs of that republic, while Poland was harvesting enough foodstuffs to relieve immediate distress. Because of the large area in Poland too recently recovered from the Bolsheviki for orderly cultivation, Poland will still need some outside help. The great need of both countries is raw materials for manufacture.

Second on the Sea. The Navy Year Book, issued for the first time since 1917, shows America's Navy second in power only to that of Great Britain. The total of American combatant and non-combatant ships is 778, with a tonnage of 1,795,481. Ships under construction will increase the total strength of the Navy to 1,405 vessels of all classes, with a tonnage of 3,042,975. Great Britain now has 702 fighting ships, and is building 210. The United States has 244 and is building 350.

Temperance Agitation in England. Reports circulated in England that the Anti-Saloon League of the United States would undertake to organize the British Isles has caused much comment in the London newspapers. The presence there of William E. Johnson, an Anti-Saloon League organizer, seemed to lend color to the rumors. Mr. Johnson, however, has issued a statement in which he says the American organization will take no part in English affairs.

German-Polish War Again. Smoldering resentment by Germans against the Poles in Silesia, held in check for several months by the activities of the Peace Conference, has burst forth in a new conflict along the southeastern frontier. The Polish population drove the Germans from two villages on the German side of the line of demarcation, and the result was a speedy concentration in the district of both Polish and German troops with all the equipment of an army in the field. Hostilities are in progress.

Long-Delayed Peace. Officials of the Peace Conference see little hope of completing the details of the three treaties still to be signed before November. Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria and Turkey are still to sign, and only the Austrian treaty has been completed.

Prince Renounces Right to Throne. Crown Prince Charles of Rumania has renounced his rights to the throne because the king and the government refuse to recognize his marriage, in 1918, to the daughter of an army officer.

British Attack Kronstadt. A small British fleet, on August 18, attacked a Bolshevist fleet near Kronstadt, sank a battleship and a cruiser, and badly damaged another cruiser, and then bombarded the city. The British lost three small motor craft. The engagement was a part of a general movement on the part of British, Finns and Esthonians against Petrograd.

Remove the Film

From Your Teeth—
Then Look at Them

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Let Your Own Eyes Tell

THIS is to urge a free ten-day test of a tooth paste which combats the film. See the results and then decide if filmless teeth will pay.

That slimy film which you feel with your tongue is the cause of most tooth troubles. The tooth brush alone doesn't end it. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it.

It clings to the teeth, gets into crevices and stays. That is why teeth brushed twice daily still discolor and decay.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So, despite the tooth brush, all these troubles have been constantly increasing.

Dental science has found a way to combat that film. The way is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. It does what nothing else has done. That is the tooth paste we ask you to try—use a ten-day tube at our cost and see the results for yourself.

You Do Not End the Film

Your present methods remove food debris, but they do not end the film. So teeth discolor and tartar forms. Wherever the film is, decay may follow.

The use of Pepsodent applies pepsin to the film. The film is albuminous and pepsin is the digestant of albumin. The object is to dissolve the film, then to constantly combat it.

Pepsin long seemed impossible. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But dental science has now discovered a harmless activating method. And that has made the constant use of active pepsin possible.

Clinical tests under able authorities have proved the results beyond question. Leading dentists all over America now urge the use of Pepsodent. It is keeping millions of teeth white, safe and clean.

Now we ask you to prove it.

The Future Life

International Sunday School Lesson for September 14. Matt. 25:31-46; John 14:2, 3; II Cor. 5:10; I Peter 1:3-5

By Rev. George D. Allison, Ph.D.

THROUGHOUT all the ages the question of immortality has come with perennial challenge, affecting every thoughtful mind. Far back in the days of Job it was asked, "If a man die, shall he live again?" During the great war, with its death-lists of millions, the problem became acute once more, and a new interest in the subject has sprung up, with new books by able thinkers. We had best follow the teachings of Jesus, who brought life and immortality to light, as he did the existence and love of the Father. In revealing the wondrous love of God, he also revealed the great truth that God cared for his children too much to see them perish. He knew the character of God the Father. Thus in answering the Sadducees (Mark 12 : 18) Jesus spoke with authority when he told them that God is the God of the living, and the fact that he is the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob means that they are still living. This is high ground. The very nature of God as Father means that we shall not die! To parenthood every child is sacred.

Jesus cared more to demonstrate by his own life and personality than to chop logic on so mighty an issue. He so lived and so died that men have felt with St. Peter, "It was impossible for death to hold him." We are sure of the message, "Jesus lives!" And he himself always linked our fate with his own, saying, "Because I live, ye shall live also." Paul rightly catches up the Master's thought and links the disciple's destiny with his Lord's. Christ is the "first-fruits of them that sleep." Every loyal follower of his has the full assurance that the Master's great prayer will be answered, where he said, "Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am." Those who are followers of Jesus and keepers of his commandments find his revelations of the future growing firmer within their souls. Those who are most Christ-like leave the same impression, that the quality of immortality lies within them—the gift of God, which is eternal life.

Paul did not end his career on the headsman's block, but received the "prize of the high calling of God in Christ," toward which he yearned. Conscience dictates a Higher Court of Appeals than earth's supremest tribunal. Man's moral nature demands a future judgment where wrongs shall be redressed and justice done. There are millions oppressed and outraged here below—God's children, who never had their chance. Surely there is a future of opportunity for them. Evil, too, is not always punished in this life. Always in Christian thought there has arisen the thought of a solemn assize in the future. Christ pictures such a scene in his allegory of the sheep and the goats. The good and the bad are not merged in a common oblivion; there needs must be another realm where the fruits of life are harvested, whether bitter or sweet.

In the light of our faith death loses its sharpest terrors, though not its human sadness nor its pain. Our soldiers in the war taught us to look at death without fear. "Gone west" was the boyish way of softening the shock of parting, and introducing something of the thought of a destination and a pioneering venture into another world. Tennyson, in his "Sunset and Evening Star," pictures the passing as that of a ship across a dangerous reef, on a new voyage with the great Pilot at the helm. Hugo said that his body was decaying like an aged tree, but his soul was putting forth green branches. These men had caught the vision of the future life and they teach us to learn to look Death in the face unafraid. For it is certain that every one of us must meet him soon or late. It makes a difference then whether one has come to know Jesus well or not. His best friends and most loyal servants are serenest as the hour strikes.

"That's very nice," replied Livingstone, "but that does not settle the salary question. I don't want my wife to support me."

"Oh, that's all fixed," replied Pete with a chuckle. "I'll jine yer church, elect myself a member of the finance committee, and make that bunch of tightwads raise yer pay. How does that strike ye'?"

Livingstone stared at Pete, whose face now glowed with the new light of spiritual regeneration.

"What about—fishing, and hunting on Sundays, drinking, and all that?"

"You once said that such things were my own affair, and I have decided to quit. I am going to be a Christian. I guess nobody can object to that."

They sat for a long time and talked over plans for the future.

Then Pete got out his colored chalks to prepare the announcements for the following Sundays.

"What is your subject going to be?" asked Pete.

Livingstone paused a moment.

"Better advertise "The Prodigal's Return." I was going to preach on something else, but I think the new topic will be more appropriate."

"It ought to be "How Two Prodigals Came Back," commented Pete, "but we will let it go your way."

Many of the people were glad to see the familiar bulletins again, and all rallied to fill the church on the following Sunday. They all gave Pete a royal greeting for turning from his old ways, but very few knew how the minister in the pulpit had wandered away and been brought back. Grace Hardin knew, and her eyes were misty with tears as she listened to the sermon, which had a double meaning to at least three people that day.

Going Fishing with a Shovel

HEN Henry went with his mother and father to live in far-away Africa, he found a that was very different from the where he had formerly lived, and nuch interested in all the strange flowers, animals and people. But ost interesting occurrence of all was Mr. Adams, one of the men who d with Harry's father, came to ne day and asked if he would like fishing.

h, yes; but I haven't got any or line."

e won't need one this time," the said, laughingly. "We'll just take along." And he waved his hand d a shovel and a basket that were e ground a few feet away.

oing fishing with a shovel?" exclaimed, and he laughed, think- at it must be a joke.

wever, it did not seem to be a joke, esently they drove off through the s and fields, until after a time they to a narrow and shallow river. winter and spring seasons this is broad and very deep, the waters ng swiftly down from the moun- ; but in the long, hot summer, in Africa takes place while the e in the United States are having r, the river dries up so that there y a stream left, not enough water boat to float on, hardly enough for to swim in. And the earth along anks is baked so hard that it is st like cement. Only near the water here any soft mud.

. Adams hitched the horse and they d out along the hard mud until reached the more moist earth e edge of the stream. Mr. Adams d about on the ground for several ds.

ere's a spot where we will find a Mr. Adams said presently, and rted to dig. He turned over sev- hovelfuls of mud, then out wiggled a fish that looked like an eel. It was about ten inches long, and colored a bright yellow.

"It's a real fish, and not a snake?" Henry asked.

"It's a real fish—one of the many strange things that live in Africa. It is called the lungfish, and it is different from all the rest of the fishes, for it has lungs like a human being, instead of gills, and can live without water. In the winter, when there is plenty of water in the river, these lungfishes swim about just as any other fish, the only difference being that they do sometimes rise to the top of the water and take a few breaths. They like fresh air, and they do not live in very deep water.

"In the summer time the water gets so shallow that even a lungfish cannot live, so these strange fishes dig their way into the mud, curl themselves up in a circle, and live in the mud and air until the summer is over and the waters begin to rise. There are always holes in mud, and that is how they get air."

"How wonderful!" Henry exclaimed. "The lungfishes are just like the squirrels and bears at home in the United States; they go to sleep for part of the year, only the bears and squirrels sleep in the winter, and the fish in summer."

"Exactly," Mr. Adams told him. "And now we'll do something that the natives always do. We'll dig up some cakes of mud with the fish inside, carry them home that way, and then when we are ready for a fish dinner we will break open the cake of mud, and the fish will be nice and fresh—ready to be cooked for dinner."

As they dug in the mud for the fishes, Mr. Adams told Henry that lungfish lived in South America and Australia, as well as Africa. The fish in Australia grow to be five or six pounds in weight, and make splendid eating.

A Gipsy Soldier-Evangelist

BEFORE the war, Captain Gipsy Pat Smith, of the Tyneside Scottish, was a well-known evangelist in Great Britain and had conducted many notable Gospel campaigns there. When war was declared, his baggage was on the steamer and he was prepared for a nine months' evangelistic tour of the United States. Changing his plans, he joined the British army as a private, enlisting in the famous Lord Lovat's Scouts. He soon was made a sergeant and sent on recruiting service. After helping to raise the Tyneside Scottish Brigade of the Northumberland Fusiliers, he was commissioned as a Second Lieutenant in that brigade. He went to France in 1915, was in several minor engagements, and finally went "over the top" on the first of July, 1916, at the great battle of the Somme. He was wounded leading his men in attack, and lay from 8 A.M. till 11.30 P.M. outside the German lines, with a shattered left arm and thigh, both badly broken by machine-gun fire. In the darkness he started to crawl to the British trenches, only 700 yards off, but fainted several times and finally tumbled senseless into the trenches at 7.30 o'clock. That day 828 men in his battalion went "over the top" with 28 officers, and 714 men and 23 officers were killed outright.

Captain Gipsy Pat Smith

Captain Smith was nineteen months in hospital, undergoing nine operations. When he came out, he was offered his discharge, but decided to stay on till the war was finished. He was accepted and was on the firing line for the last seven months of the war. He was in France when the first Americans came over. His statement is very interesting concerning the Americans.

"The British and French had their backs to the wall," he said. "We had withstood the enemy's great attack and now we were down to our lowest ebb and there were no troops behind to carry on if we went under. I shall never forget that morning when the news came across the wire that two million American soldiers had arrived in France. The effect was marvelous! The men cheered up at once, as they knew there were now fresh troops to carry on the war, and that the turning-point had been reached. From that moment things The old morale and the old cheer came back, and from we started off confidently on attack."

Captain Smith was in the assaults of Roulaux, Armentière and the River Scheldt, and was lines when the armistice came. promoted to the captain for servic the field. A Great Soul-Winner Gone

MARY RAWLINGS BUTTS, who passed away at Nyack, N. Y., on April 4, was one of the brightest and most successful of women evangelists. She was a native of Kentucky and in early life turned to Christian work. She traveled much with her talented husband, Rev. Benjamin Franklin Butts. For many years she had charge of the summer children's work of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City. It was soon discovered that she had a message with wonderful power, not only for children, but for women and mixed congregations. In many campaigns she did the preaching, while Mr. Butts took charge of the music and aftermeetings.

During the summer work in New York City, Mrs. Butts had many thrilling experiences. One was in a tent for Italians, in a congested district. Two gangs of unusually rough lads had a fight in the tent and one lad was almost killed. Mrs. Butts and her helper were obliged to climb a high fence to reach a place of safety. Undaunted, she went back to the tent the next night kept up her work there until the the summer. To her credit be i that one of the gangs was reache the Gospel and went bodily int little Italian Sunday school as a Club.

The pastor of a nearby chur cently received a letter from an American soldier in France, wh been a member of this gang as In his letter he said: "I have bee the top seven times, and have ju ceived orders to go over for the time, and I do not expect to come but I remember the tent and the taught in the tent and am not af Mrs. Butts had led that boy to Jesus Christ as his personal Savi

Many touching tributes to her c ter have come from pastors in di States. In one of these the writer "She was a Christian if ever the one. Now she knows the whole of the thousands of lives she to here and made better."

But another states: "We are to use our best judgment and good common sense in knowing the mind of God." But when twenty good men use their twenty best judgments and twenty good common senses and it results in twenty different opinions, it certainly would be just as good judgment and the use of as good common sense to take the plain statement of the Word, unless otherwise indicated in the context.

The 500 references in the Old Testament to Christ's first coming meant just what they said and were fulfilled literally. And the reason he came unto his own and his own received him not, was because they would not take it literally. They used destructive criticism. They added to or took from, or changed the meaning, and so missed him. Hence the consequent woe that has rested on them. And it is not at all unlikely that many will miss Christ in his second coming for the same reason.

If the 500 references in the Old Testament were literally fulfilled respecting his first appearing, why not believe the 300 references in the Old Testament to his second appearing are also to be taken literally, and especially when in some cases both references occur in the same passage? Why apply one principle to the 500 and not to the 300. And if the 300 in the Old Testament be taken literally, why change the principle when we come to the New Testament, where one out of every eighteen passages refers to Christ's second appearing?

I would rather appear before God and say: "I took you at your word and believed you meant just what you said," than to risk accepting any other meaning.

Nor should we be indifferent and say, "It matters not to me." It is just as important to believe and believe aright concerning Christ's second coming as it was important for the Jews to believe and believe aright in reference to his first coming, or for the virgins to believe correctly concerning the bridegroom's coming, or for Adam and Eve to have believed what God said about eating the forbidden fruit, or for Noah and the antediluvians to believe God's Word about the coming flood, or for Lot and the people of Sodom to take God at his word, or for the children of Israel to believe God and go in and possess the land.

Those who are indifferent, or who do not believe aright, or who do not take God at his word, are likely to be as the Jews who missed Christ, and the foolish virgins who were shut out, and our parents who were driven out, and the antediluvians who were drowned, and the people of Sodom who were destroyed, and Israel who wandered in the wilderness for forty years.

"As it was in the days of Noah—also as it was in the days of Lot—even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed. L. L. GRAY, of the most important phases the work of the Salvation Army United States is that conducted men and women confined in the institutions. The work among eads like a bright and shining n remaking men and women into the scrapheap of humanity.

Salvation in Prisons

e you ever heard of the "Four ed Thousand"? They are men omen confined in the penal insti- . Their story dates back to when the first Prisoners' Rescue es were launched. In May of ear a Salvation officer stationed tford, Conn., was invited by the n of the Hartford jail to conduct s.

ly but surely the little group of nd women banded together to ght and comfort to the prisoners access to other prisons. The first Home was opened in Brooklyn ember, 1886. In 1891 the first prisoner was committed to the Salvation Army officer at Fostoria, Ohio. Since that time the Parole Boards in every state have come to rely upon the splendid work of the Salvation Army in aiding men released from prison. In 1895 the Labor Bureau of the Army was opened in Boston.

Commander Evangeline Booth sums up the psychology of the organization's prison work as follows:

"We believe in the principle of punishment, but punishment tempered with mercy. It is for this reason that we do not allow sentiment to carry us beyond due bounds in dealing with sentenced men.

"We believe that curative science, recreation, education and industry have a part in the regeneration of prisoners, but we do not escape the conclusion that where all other devices have failed to effect a cure, the salvation of God has in a great number of cases brought about a complete reformation."

THE RE-CREATION OF BRIAN KENT

Illustrations in Colors by J. Allen St. John

THE RE-CREATION OF BRIAN KENT, sweet and appealing in its pathos and vibrant with the local color of the mystic, enchanted Ozarks—The Shepherd of the Hills Country—marks the author's greatest advance in story telling charm. Brian Kent, Auntie Sue, Judy and Betty Jo are wonderful creations. There are thrilling incidents related with such vivid realism that one reads with breathless interest. And yet the fascinating power of the story is rather in the clean-cut analysis of life and character, and in the skillful visualization of the clash and conflicts of life's invisible forces out of which the thrilling incidents come.

A CROWN OF GLORY

By FRANK HADLEY

OVER the hilly and winding country roads, rain-soaked and wheel-rutted, a motley procession wended its halting and toilsome way. Leading the procession was a one-horse vehicle known locally as a "top buggy," which showed unmistakable signs of long and hard usage. The driver of the dispirited horse was evidently a farm boy at the awkward age, the only other occupant a man of middle life, whose clerical garb bespoke his calling. After this came the mud-spattered hearse, whose dingy glass sides revealed within the reason for the whole dreary procession—a plain black casket whose size indicated that some adult had passed to the beyond.

Following the hearse was a larger wagon, a "carryall," drawn by a bony farm team, and carrying six men, the "bearers," whose sad duty it was to place in its last resting-place the plain black casket in the hearse ahead. After the bearers came the carriages with the mourners, followed by a varied assortment of vehicles, some pretentious carriages drawn by sleek horses, evidences of prosperity; others farm wagons more or less dilapidated and drawn by dejected-looking animals, mute witnesses to the poverty of their owners. But rich or poor, prosperous or unprosperous, all were bound on the same sad but loving mission of respect to one who had been the sympathetic and helpful companion and friend of all.

Finally all arrived at the neglected and forlorn-looking spot called by courtesy a cemetery. One of the saddest and most deplorable sights in some parts of the country is the all too apparent evidence of forgetfulness and neglect shown by the appearance of some of the rural cemeteries. At the rickety gate the slow-moving procession was met by the sexton, who guided the leaders along the grass-grown drive to a neatly-kept plot which contrasted strikingly with the unkept ones all about. Between a long mound marked by a headstone inscribed "Father," and several shorter ones bearing the names of boys and girls, a mound of fresh earth marked a newly opened grave. Here the procession halted. The minister, with bowed head, book in hand, took his place at the head of the grave. The bearers tenderly and reverently, though awkwardly, following the whispered directions of the black-clad undertaker, lifted the casket from the hearse and placed it in the wooden box awaiting it over the opened grave.

After the cover was fastened down, the minister with faltering voice spoke simply but sympathetically and feelingly of the departed. From his remarks one gathered much of the life history and good deeds of her whose earthly career and work were now ended. Widowed when just past middle life after being bereft of the major part of her large family of children, she had kept her remaining children about her, and had fought her way through on the rocky hillside farm which had been her only heritage.

But strenuous as had been her own hard lot, she had found time to minister to the needs of her neighbors. She had been the good angel who, from her own ripe experience, attended at the ushering in of every new life for miles around. The young mothers trusted her implicitly for counsel and help. Was there sickness of child or adult, her motherly instinct and unerring skill were called on to minister to the sufferers. And the terrors of the last great change and the grief of the survivors were assuaged by her gentle ministrations. Through all the vicissitudes of life, to young or old, she had been the efficient and helpful friend of that farm community, many of whose members had a hard struggle to gain a bare subsistence for their families from the steep and rocky hillsides. All this service she had rendered freely, cheerfully, uncomplainingly.

Questions and Answers

N. M. W., Minnesota. There cannot be uniformity of experience in religion. Some, like Timothy, are trained in the faith in childhood, at a mother's knee. Others come to manhood or womanhood before conversion. Then to many the great change comes quietly and with little outward demonstration, while to others it is a struggle before they come under conviction of sin, accept Christ as Saviour, and make complete surrender of themselves to him in all things as their guide. Paul's conversion on the open highway was the most dramatic illustration of its kind. There are many today whose lives, up to the hour of their conversion, were steeped in sin and who, when they experience the joy of forgiveness and acceptance, allow their feelings free expression. This is no doubt largely a matter of temperament, but it is certainly nothing that calls for criticism. If, as the Bible tells us, the angels in heaven rejoice over one sinner that repents and is saved, surely the saved one and those who are with him must be allowed the privilege of giving utterance to the joy that is in their hearts at such a time. We must remember that the apostles, in their evangelistic work, were accused by some who heard them of being full of new wine, and of "turning the world upside down." We need to be careful lest we apply the same worldy criticism to the work of the Holy Spirit upon the hearts of men today.

J. N. C., Hickory, N. C., one of many readers in agricultural districts, writes in favor of the repeal of the Daylight Saving Law. "Our people are unanimous for repeal," he says in his letter. "We want all the time," the claim of the farmers being that the daylight saving cuts off precious hours from their working day.'

M. A. L., Exchange, W. Va. There are many aspects of the future life that are not definitely revealed to us in this life. No one, therefore, has warrant for more positive assertion on such matters than the Bible justifies. We are taught to believe that God is just, and that wilful sin, unrepented of and unforgiven, will not pass unpunished. And while believing in the divine justice, we have also the assurance of the divine mercy, which is boundless. The mere suggestion of separation from all that is revealed to us in connection with the life hereafter would imply such conditions awaiting the unrepentant as would fill them with heartburnings and torture them with unavailing regrets. Let us not judge others, but while we are here, and have the opportunity, rather let us try to win them for his sake who has said: "He that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Remember, too, that he saves to the uttermost.

H. A. T., Pasadena, Calif. 1. There are many sins that bring punishment to the sinner in this life. Sins against one's own body bring sickness and premature death; sins against society—violence, dishonesty, slander, etc.—are punished in various ways. There are, however, sins in thought, word and deed which criminal statutes cannot reach. God stands ready to forgive the repentant sinner, if he will forsake his ways and sincerely seek forgiveness through our Mediator and Saviour Jesus Christ. 2. Not some, but all of our sins need to be repented of. So gracious is our Heavenly Father that his forgiveness is not of this or that particular sin, but of all. He does not do things by halves. One may have expiated sins against society by accepting the punishment due to lawbreakers; but these sins also will be forever blotted out, so that forgiveness may be full and free.

S. C. H., Mackoy, Ky. Works of necessity or mercy are justifiable on the Lord's Day, but no other. It is a day divinely ordained for a cessation from labor—a day of rest, reconciliation, worship and religious joyfulness—not a day given over to worldly pleasure, joy-riding, games, social festivities, as many make it. No labor should be done on that day which can be done on secular da only work that is absolutely indispens which relates to urgent matters of char helpfulness. This expresses the attitude of the Christian Church toda

Mrs. J. F. W., Denver, Colo. The assemblies of Christians had no fixed habitations. The first church gatheri described in Acts 1 : 13-14. These pl meetings were frequently held in places had other uses, and the passage in I 11 : 18, referring to the "coming toge in the church, may not conclusively ind an organization permanently located building specially dedicated to the work a long time the church met wherever it mostly in private houses, although it sometimes necessary, on account of cution, to assemble in desert places and in catacombs. Not until the latter part second century does history make me of the "Lord's house," the "house of as a building with a fixed location and for a specific purpose.

S. Y., Buffalo, Okla. In the early Ch it was held by some that sin after baptis the unpardonable sin. (This idea has since been proven false, the commonly cepted view being that the ascription abolic agency of the work of the Holy is unpardonable.) Therefore many wer baptized until they felt themselves at th tals of death. Some commentators hold I Cor. 15 : 29 refers to these. Also there a practice current in apostolic times w encouraged Christians to be baptized t place in the church and in the line of ma dom those who had fallen asleep. They baptized to do the work the dead would done had they lived. At a later time there was a mistaken practice of baptism o living in the name of the dead who had unsaved, hoping that salvation might be gained for them. This was unscript and illogical, and the belief did not long vive. This practice began after the da Paul. It might have been encouraged by verse, but could not be indicated by it

The BRUNSWICK Method of Reproduction

The Ultona

Achieving the Ultimate in Phonograph Music

By Means of Two Exclusive and Scientific Features

The Brunswick Method of Reproduction gained instant and wide-spread public favor because it enriches the tone qualities of all records. For this alone it is adored by artists and approved by the hypercritical. It embodies the true principles of tone reproduction and complies with the established laws of acoustics in projecting tone. Two revolutionary factors, among others essentially different from other phonographs, make this possible. They are the Ultona and the Tone Amplifier.

The Ultona Plays All Records

The Ultona — a product of creative genius — enables one to play all make records on the Brunswick. Not a combination contrivance nor complex mechanism, yet involving a fundamental principle of sound. By a slight turn of the hand it supplies the proper needle, correct weight and precise diaphragm.

The Amplifier Enriches Tones

As the name implies it amplifies tone, making it truer and sweeter. It is a vibrant tone chamber like the sounding board of a fine piano or violin. Constructed entirely of moulded hollywood and free from metal it gives the requisite resiliency for unfolding and projecting true tone.

Ask to Hear The Brunswick

Any Brunswick dealer will be glad to demonstrate the many claims made for it. Choose your favorite record to be tested — the one that will help you judge best. Your verdict like that of unnumbered thousands will be "the one super phonograph."

HOW TO KNOW YOUR BIBLE

INAUGURATION OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BIBLE COURSE

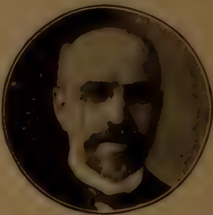
OPEN TO ITS SUBSCRIBERS (OLD AND NEW)

AFTER months of planning and negotiation, the Christian Herald is glad to announce to its readers that the orga ization of The Christian Herald Bible Course, to be conducted by mail and correspondence, has been complete The course will be under the direction of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.

You do not need to leave your home. You do not need to neglect your home duties, but you c acquire valuable knowledge by a system that will prove a pleasant recreation.

Rev. P. B. Fitzwater, D. D.

Rev. J. H. Ralston, D.D.



Rev. James M. Gray, D.D.

Rev. J. C. Page

Rev. L. W. Gosnell

Rev. James M. Gray, D.D., the Dean of the Moody Bible Institute, of Chicago, has kindly consented to be the head of the facul of the Christian Herald Bible Course. He will have as his chief assistants, Rev. J. H. Ralston, D.D., head of the ~~large~~ Corresponden Department of the Moody Institute, Rev. P. B. Fitzwater, D.D., Registrar of the Faculty and Professor of Bible Analysis, Psycholo and Ethics, Rev. L. W. Gosnell, Assistant Dean and Professor of Bible Synthesis, and the Rev. J. C. Page, Professor of Christi Doctrine and Pastoral Theology. The last three named, like Dr. Gray himself, have all been teachers of large, popular Bible Classes a know from years of experience how to present the Scriptures to the people. It should be said that the teachers represent different eva gelical denominations.

Dr. Gray's name is a guarantee of scholarship and thoroughness. All of the instructors are distinguished in Bible knowledge.

WE LOOK confidently for a very large enrollment of those who desire to take advantage of this opportunity to acquire a real working and living knowledge of God's Word. Now, more than at any previous period of the world's history, the people need Bible Teaching and sound Scriptural knowledge, at a time when many of the teachers in our universities, theological schools and seminaries, follow false Bible interpretations, and even attempt the repudiation of the Divine plan for man's salvation. Such teaching has become a menace to the spiritual life of the nation and the world.

The object of the Christian Herald Bible Course is to enable all who enroll to acquire a working knowledge of the Bible and a right conception of God's will and purpose for the world.

The Course which we now offer to members of the Christian Herald Family is one for which any subscriber of the Christian Herald is eligible. It will run through six months, in weekly lesson papers. A full outline of the Course will be furnished to members at stated periods as it progresses, with full printed instructions to every student. The membership fee will pay for all printed matter, such as leaflets, question blanks, etc., postpaid. Students, however, in corresponding with the faculty, will enclose postage stamps for reply to their letters, as with thousands of members, the small fee could not cover that expenditure in the aggregate, and yet it will be a trifling expense to each student when asking special questions of the faculty.

Ordinarily, such a Course as is now offered would involve an expenditure to the student of many times the nominal fee of $1.00 which we have fixed as the cost to each member when a regular paid subscriber to the Christian Herald. It should be explained that the Christian Herald Course is conducted for service to Christian Herald subscribers, and not for profit. This is a privilege extended to Christian Herald subscribers only, and to those whom they may bring along with themselves at enrollment time, and who are ready to qualify as subscribers to the Christian Herald, in order to secure the great privilege of this Bible Course.

To enumerate the benefits of a really good Bible Course, such as we have arranged with so much care and forethought, would take larger space than can be given here. By no means the least of these benefits is that it will equip the student for good practical work in Church and Sunday School, or for taking a helpful part in many of the numerous activities of Christian service, as well as fitting the student to speak with intelligent comprehension on many questions demanding fuller and more accurate knowledge of the Bible. In a few words, it is a Course which aims to make the student a better all-round Christian man or woman, one bearing real witness; and capable of aiding in many ways the advancement of the Kingdom. To attain this standard should be the laudable ambition of every man or woman who desires success in the Christian life.

"A man has deprived himself of the best there is in the world who has deprived himself of intimate knowledge of the Bible."—Woodrow Wilson.

THE MEMBERSHIP INCLUDES:

Full printed instructions to each student. Regular supply of printed matter, such as leaflets, question blanks, etc., for the six months' course of 24 lessons.

The whole Bible Course will be so simplified Dr. Gray and his associates of the faculty that t lessons can be easily comprehended and master from the leaflets which will go to all members fro time to time.

This is an opportunity which we strongly urge eve reader to make his or her own. Send in your r newal of subscription, together with your name f enrollment in the Bible Course, without delay, acco panied by the extra dollar for membership fee. the same time we would ask our readers to do a litt missionary work in informing their friends and a quaintances of this opportunity. Thus, your frien on your recommendation will share the benefits the Course with other members of the Circle. a great privilege, and we hope it will be free availed of.

There could be no finer or more gracious gift to so friend than a subscription to the Christian Heral with this Bible Course. $3.50 would cover the co of such a gift.

Our students in the Bible Course will learn mo about the Scriptures in these six months of stud under the best of teachers than they could possibl learn in a lifetime of desultory reading on the sam subject. They will learn to view the Bible in a ne light; they will become familiar with the historicit of the books themselves; the authors and their pe sonal characteristics, the surroundings, the spirit the times in which they lived, the reason of their in spired message, and the meaning and purpose of th message itself. They will be able to trace the li of prophecy which runs through the whole volume Scripture, and to note the fulfilment of many proph ecies in Bible times and the beginning of the fulfil ment of others in the present age. These and ma other vital topics will be features of the Course.

Fill and sign this enrollment blank, if you are now a subscriber, and send in your renewal together with your enrollment fee. By sending in the name of a new subscriber, who desires to join th Bible Course, you will be helping the project to success and doing a real service to the newcomer besides

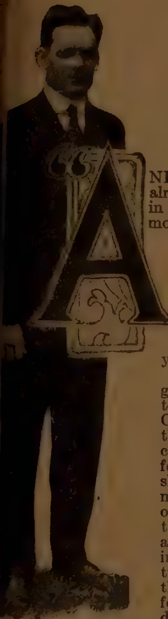
THREE CHURCHES IN ONE

The "United Church" Has Given to Garrettsville, Ohio, Revived Religious Zeal, Increased Sunday School Attendance, and a Lively Community Spirit

By B. H. DARROW



v. W. W. Tuttle, t and present pas- of the Garrettsville Federated Church

"AND you say the money has already been raised to put in the shower baths and remodel the whole church as a gymnasium? Say, that building will count for more now than it ever did before, won't it? And you say the other church building will be made into a library? Am I hearing you aright?"

The animated interrogation point was a visitor to Garrettsville, Portage County, Ohio, just showing the incredulity of all village church people who have felt for years that the thing should be done, but had met no other result of their own efforts than to batter the wings of their hope against the sharp, enclosing wall of denominational tradition. Hundreds, yes, thousands, have in the past few years given up the dream, feeling the odds too great against them. So this particular visitor probably asked no more questions than Rev. W. W. Tuttle was accustomed to answering. These Garretts- e churches did find the "common denominator." ey found a platform broad enough and high enough every one to 'stand on without giving up his victions.

Before going ahead with the story it might be well say a word about Garrettsville and the people who putting it on the church map of Ohio as one of pioneers in attacking the blight of "over-church- and under-Christianizing." Over one thousand mmunities in Ohio are so badly over-churched that ir only hope is some such plan as this little Portage unty village has evolved.

Garrettsville is a prosperous Ohio community on e Erie Railroad between Youngstown and Cleve- nd. The population of almost exactly one thousand ls is engaged partly in farming, partly in manu- turing (for there is good water-power), and partly the business of ministering to the daily wants of e people. The good houses, electric lights, and ved streets and sidewalks indicate a progressive- ss and community spirit that are often absent in ger towns. It is not surprising, therefore, that the ople of such a community should come to recog- ze the unbusinesslike and un-Christian policy of mpetition in church organization, and, without tside help, work out a plan which has proved suc- ssful in the "United Church of Garrettsville."

N APRIL, 1916, the religious work of the town was in the condition often found in rural Ohio. There ere four churches, Congregational, Methodist, Dis- ples of Christ, and Baptist—one for every 250 in- bitants. The Congregational Church, which was e largest, paid the munificent salary of $800 and me for its pastor. The others paid a much smaller m and shared their pastor's services with other nall towns. The Disciple preacher was occupied uring the week as Educational Secretary of the M. C. A. in Youngstown, thirty miles away. The aptists were aided by their State Convention. Many the best members of all the churches had died or oved away. The spirit of rivalry that existed was own when the Congregational pastor attempted to ganize a branch of the Boy Scouts of America for ll the boys of the community, and was obliged to abandon the plan because members of other churches feared it was an attempt to win the boys over to his church.

A good degree of credit for the changed condition of affairs in Garrettsville is due to the good sense of the Congregational minister, Dr. Robert G. Hutchins, who had come from Brooklyn, and, having other sources of income, was willing to give to the church in Garrettsville better services than they might otherwise have secured. It was in a conference at Cleveland that Dr. Robert G. Hutchins gave an address on the over-churched conditions in rural Ohio, but in the preparation of that address he became so much interested in the subject that he began to educate his own congregation along lines of cooperation and union. As early as January, 1914, he attempted to effect a union with the Disciples, but the time was not ripe. Later attempts to unite with the Baptists also failed.

The opportunity came in May, 1916. In the middle of April the Baptist minister resigned. On the first of May Dr. Hutchins, who had held the Garrettsville pastorate for five years, and was an elderly man, retired from active service and removed to Cleveland. The Disciple preacher then gave in his resignation and the three churches were without leaders. One coincidence should be noted. All three of these churches have the so-called congregational form of government; that is, there is no outside authority to which they must appeal for direction or permission to act. Also, it might be noted that each has the same program or form of worship and of communion, the only difference being in regard to baptism.

Accordingly, one morning in April, a leading member of the Congregational Church met one of his close friends of the Baptist Church on the street and suggested that now would be a good time to federate. The man replied that he had thought the matter over, and he proposed that they hold union services during the summer. On the first Sunday in May the Baptists and Congregationalists worshiped together, and on the following Sunday they were joined by the Disciples.

THE church attendance was better than it had ever been known to be, being larger than the aggregate of the previous attendance in the separate churches. The Sunday school, instead of an attendance of sixty-five, twenty and twelve, respectively, had an average attendance of 130, with all the benefits of the enthusiasm of numbers, better music, better teachers, and better Christian spirit.

For a time the prayer meetings were held alternately in the Baptist and Disciple church buildings, which, in order to get away from the denominational spirit, were renamed the Maple Avenue and the South Street churches.

As the weeks went by there was naturally some talk by people outside these three churches. "Will the Methodists join?" was a most natural question. This church was nearly as large as the Congregational Church, but the pastor was obliged to serve another church out of town, and a number of the Methodists were in favor of uniting and forming one federated community church. But at a meeting which was held to consider the matter other counsels prevailed. One man declared that he was "not in favor of aiding any movement that could not last a year." With others, loyalty to denomination was so strong that they could not see any way to join the new movement without surrendering deeply cherished convictions. On the other hand, some business men who had not previously cared about church work became interested and offered to contribute generously if the plan could be carried through.

The former Baptist Church of Garrettsville, now remodeled inside, with a gymnasium and shower baths installed. It is a popular community center

As September first approached, the question of a permanent union was seriously discussed. Each church took a separate vote. In only one was there any division, and even there the members were "practically unanimous" in favor of continuing the union services indefinitely.

Each church then chose members of a joint committee of arrangements. A new organization was formed and incorporated, with the name of the "United Church," which should include all who were members of any of the three churches. No member was asked to alter any of his beliefs, and any candidate for admission might choose his own mode of admission. Contributions for missionary work were to be sent to those denominational bodies indicated by the givers or as determined by a joint committee. For all local work the members were to act as one body.

One of the most difficult problems to solve was the selection of a pastor, but this also was solved in the spirit of brotherly kindness. Rev. Warren W. Tuttle, M.A., is a young man of rural experience, a graduate of Yale University, a quiet, sympathetic personality, yet a fluent and effective speaker who dares to talk plainly.

When the writer asked Mr. Payne, one of the trustees, to what denomination the pastor belonged, Mr. Payne replied, "We asked him not to tell us." That was not important. They wanted to get the right kind of man, and they wanted to keep denominational prejudices entirely out of consideration.

They wanted a man imbued with "ruralitis" instead of one affected by "urbanitis" who would sooner jump to the city at the first opportunity than to build up his village church.

A FEW intimate touches on the resulting church life may be had from visitors, some of them skeptical before investigation, but none of them other than enthusiastic after a visit. The remarks of George Eddy of Youngstown are typical:

"Without previous notice I visited the United Church of Garrettsville as a representative of the Ohio Rural Life Association. I was met most cordially at the door by the chief usher, Mr. C. O. Judd, who, as I afterward learned, was chosen for that position because of his peculiar fitness. It was the opening exercise of the Sunday school. On the way to my seat I was introduced to the teacher of the adult class, and, as I was seated, I was introduced to several men who sat near. This usher evidently appreciates the importance of little things. I felt very much at home from the first.

"The morning service deserves some special notice. I was at first impressed by the printed calendar which Mr. C. O. Judd had given me. I noticed that the selections for the organ were far better than one often finds in a country church.

"The local lodges of Masons and the Eastern Star came and sat in a body. All the seats, even those about the wall, were occupied. The choir of about twenty voices with an efficient director rendered 'Dear Land of Freedom' from Lucia. The pastor had chosen for his theme 'Fraternity.' The sermon was not the usual complimentary discourse, but a thoughtful consideration of the fearless message of St. John the Baptist to the people who came to hear him in the wilderness of Judea. The speaker showed how the Masons, like other bodies, had often forgotten the real purpose of their organization, and he appealed for a broader and more genuine spirit of brotherhood.

"The varied interests of the church were indicated by the topic of the Young People's Meeting: 'The Place of Recreation in the Life of the Church,' and by that of the mid-week prayer meeting: 'The Contribution of the Church to American Freedom.'

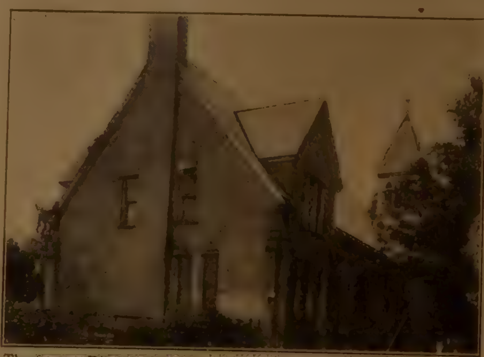
"I have heard people in other country towns complain that the automobiles were keeping people away from church. I learned that in Garrettsville there are a half dozen men who make several trips every Sunday morning to take people to and from church. Some have objected to union church work for fear that the denominational missionary bodies might suffer. In Garrettsville more money has been sent to each of the three denominational agencies than before."

THE missions of each of the three denominations have gained greatly through the federation. In 1918 the contributions amounted to $377, or about $150 above the former average total. And in addition there were contributions to other worthy causes of $660, a condition unheard of previous to the union. Garrettsville has straightened its shoulders and looks enthusiastically toward coming opportunities and duties. Its Easter and Children's Day offerings alone amounted to $250.

And what about the future? Under the leadership of the pastor the church has developed a plan of expansion which looks to an increase of the facilities of the church which will enable it to carry on a broad work of ministry to its constituency and the community.

Plans by a competent architect have been adopted for excavation under the whole church building of a basement which will be used for social and recreational purposes by the growing Sunday school, which is now pressed for room. For example, the closing Sunday of June, 1919, on a warm day, the attendance was 165, while on Children's Day, three weeks previously, the largest crowd ever gathered in the church to a religious service was present, numbering 316. The social rooms, which were quite adequate for the Congregational Church alone, have completely failed to furnish play room for the people when, as at the last two socials, the attendance numbered about 225.

The church, being interested not only in facilities for its own group use but also in considering the needs of the community, came to the conclusion that the athletic interests of the town could be better cared for by a building under community auspices than under those of the church alone. The church therefore promoted a community movement for the equipment of the former Baptist building as a gymnasium. During 1917 and 1918 the church has permitted the use of this building for a basketball court, after carefully protecting the walls and windows. The high school was the principal user, and the effectiveness of its use is shown in the girls' county championship cup, which rests in the trophy case of the local high school. A successful campaign for funds for additional facilities was carried through, and the work has begun. A committee with the pastor as a member is at work drawing up the constitution of a community organization which will take over the care and regulation of the building from the church and conduct it on a community basis.



The former Disciple Church of Garrettsville, soon to become a community library

THE United Church has also voted to place the beautiful brick edifice formerly used by the Disciples at the disposal of the community for use as a library. It is admirably adapted for the purpose, and the plan only awaits the securing of funds to finance the library movement.

It was the hope of the original promoters of the United Church that it might include all the religious forces of the community and thus be able to lead in a broad way in community activities through its own organization. As it has been unable fully to reach this ideal since the Methodist Church has not been ready to unite, the church has shifted its plane somewhat on its community program, and there has developed in recent months a spirit of cooperation between the two and the public schools in attempting to care for community needs.

The drafting committee for the new community organization above mentioned consists of the intendent of schools and the pastors of th churches. The probable name for the new org tion will be the Community Council, and in ad to the churches and school other community izations will also be represented.

This development is of particular interest, shows that if all the churches of the community c unite, those which do, if they proceed in an un spirit, can do much through their organization ir ing the community to a larger spirit and effective means of cooperation.

The Community Council of Garrettsvil valuable suggestions also for communities wish to coordinate the resident social f although a Church Union movement may r contemplated.

BUT the beneficial effect of an aroused spirit does not stop at the limits c town any more than it stops at the church It is an interesting fact that the banner gation at the last two County Sunday S Conventions has been that from the U Church of Garrettsville, with the single e tion of the delegation from the Convention

Portage County has just organized a Co Y. M. C. A. While in different parts o county there had been developing an in in doing some kind of work for young peo the county plan, it is an interesting and si cant fact that the present organization about as a result of inquiries sent the state of the Y by the United Church. In res to a letter from the pastor the assistant secretary visited Garrettsville and met a g of interested men of the United Church, the movement was started which eventually resu in aroused interest in other parts of the county the development of the idea, until Portage is o the fast-growing units in the county Y moven The new secretary began work July first.

AN INTERESTING story is just now qu being told on the minister. He had noted Saturday afternoon the chagrin of the boys wh lot-owner insisted on tilling the soil on his lot, w happened to run right through the baseball diam Mr. Tuttle expostulated to no avail. Then he the matter up with a more public-spirited cit who bought the lot and saved the only good diam in the village.

Most of us will agree that there was more reli in that deed than in half the sermons preached. dominie admits that in putting the deal through went into the pulpit with a half-prepared sermon next day.

The Boy Scouts have been organized and are q active. A spirit of loyalty, friendliness and happi seems to pervade the atmosphere. The pastor to me, "There is a perfectly wonderful amo of energy among the members here ready to used."

And as I came away he said, "This was all done the people themselves, and if any other commun should be considering such a move, we have am our members a number of good speakers who would glad to go and tell how it was done in Garrettsvil

Their Sunday School a Horse Barn

How the Rural Community Ideal Took Root and Grew in a New York Town

CAZENOVIA, N. Y., among other places, seems to refute all idea that the church plant has given way under an over-burden of social activities. The present pastor of one of the leading churches there, the Rev. Silas E. Persons, after officiating for seventeen years in his pulpit, began to suspect a few years ago that he had some responsibility for the social well-being of the people in the open country around as well as of those in the village.

Many of the farmers' families were four and five miles from the nearest church, and had access to absolutely no diversion except on occasional trips to the village. Looking into the faces of the people around him while he was conducting a home funeral in a remote section, Mr. Persons suddenly realized how little there was in the hard, dull routine of the farm to kindle enthusiasm, to inspire big ideals, or to lend zest to life. Then he caught the vision of life made worth while for them by the right sort of social organization. Since there was no other agency to undertake it he determined to make his church and his personal services minister to the whole need of the man, woman and child on the farm.

It was in the loft of a horse barn that the idea of a rural Sunday school conducted by the village church was projected, and it was received so cordially that officers, teachers, an organist, and a committee to provide flowers were elected on the spot.

On the following Sunday the little schoolhouse was crowded to the doors.

Gradually during the next few years five more Sunday schools were organized in other rural communities in the district, and four rural churches. The minister relates instances of criticism from other churches (none of which agreed to share this rural work with him) upon his abandoning his Sunday evening service in the village.

Experimenting as to the best ways to bring new interests into the lives of the farmers, the pastor planned a big banquet to be held in the village, inviting every man in his larger parish. Ninety-nine came and expressed so much interest in the varied program that it was decided to make similar ones a regular institution. Three or four a winter have been held since, and have fulfilled the pledge taken on that first night never to have a poor meeting nor a poorly attended one. There was always a semi-serious talk a current events feature, special music and some unique entertainment.

The next summer an outdoor field day was inaugurated, a kind of revival of Olympic games and festivities where village and countryside turned out regardless of church affiliations and made merry in outdoor sports, a picnic, a shooting-match, baseball games, running matches and educational featu This was so successful that first year that it led t country fair for the next season. The field-day acti ties were duplicated and competitive exhibits of pr uce and handicrafts added. There was gener rivalry in the preparation of various class exhib and in the sports and stunts when the great c arrived. A plowing match was held. There wer big public feast and a lecture on some of the new phases of agriculture by an expert who came for t occasion, and then the prizes were awarded.

As a result of the fair and subsequent ones, th was a great enthusiasm for new farm methods amo men, women and children, and a general reaching o for all available knowledge on the subject. And through the entertainment committee, which w organized of prominent townsmen irrespective their churches, for the purpose of making the lo dark winter evenings less dull, what amounted to university extension course in agriculture was intr duced. Men flocked in from far and wide to atten Mr. Persons obtained the generous cooperation of t State Experiment Station and the Department Agriculture of Cornell. Farming ceased to be ard ous toil and became an interesting problem. Th same entertainment committee imported talent of high order and gave a long series of programs whic were made self-supporting from the first.

Bible study and recreation clubs were formed i each rural community, and met from house to hous Boy Scout units and bird- and nature-study grou were formed. A strong community spirit was bor and thrived. Young people ceased to flee the sectio because of its mental and social desolation.

The Singing Heart

By NEETA MARQUIS

THERE comes no burden but it brings a song
For souls courageous, brave to bear and do.
There is no pilgrimage, however long,
But tuneful traveling cuts the miles in two.

Oh, seek the song! Its rhythm in the heart
Will ease the weary body's toil and strain!
And with a merry stave your journey start,
To speed the turning of the longest lane!

A class of foreigners eagerly taking advantage of the chance to learn English and to become good all-round American citizens

"TALK AMERICAN"

he Great Educational Movement in All the Cities for the Uniting of All Our Peoples Into a True Democracy

By GRACE HUMPHREY

VHEN we shall have time to count them up, the war will prove to have taught us many things—that working people can be bondholders, that gardens beautify nt lots, that apparently well men need thorough ical examinations to catch up minor ailments re they become serious.

rhaps most important of all these war lessons ir new point of view in regard to the foreigners ur communities. How many they were the t boards showed—soldiers in the prime of young hood who understood no English. Suddenly rica realized the danger of having in her midst e groups of people speaking alien tongues. lenly she realized the need of uniting all her les in a common aim and effort. To win the she knew we must all pull together, foreign-born native-born. And to win now in working out problems of peace the two groups must work ther.

ut a complete fusion of native-born and foreign-n can never be accomplished so long as we are arated by barriers of language. A great emer-cy, a thrilling need, brings us together temporarily. it is permanent getting together that we need nake us a united people, a democracy worthy of name. Every person speaking English is the l desired. And this is the story of one city where alk American!" has become a slogan instead of a ng phrase.

he presence of immigrants in Chicago is indeed erious problem; for where, the nation over, two n out of five are foreigners or sons of foreigners, e it is two out of three. For years and years ht schools and settlements have labored to teach glish to these newcomers, and splendid work they e done. But appalling remained the percentage foreigners speaking no English, and it increased adily. Now Chicago is approaching the problem m a new angle and feels she is on the right road last.

KE many an important movement, the new approach came in such a simple way. Requested Secretary Lane to help in Americanization work, Chicago Association of Commerce last August pointed an Americanization committee of business n. Asking on all sides for information as to thods and workers, classes and lessons, they kept aring the name Miss Frances Wetmore, over and er.

Who was this Miss Wetmore?

settlement worker, they learned, teaching glish in factories—the most noteworthy classes in Chicago—not theories, but her own method tried and proved. Better get in touch with her. d they did.

Meantime the Woman's Committee of the State uncil of Defense had brought Miss Wetmore to attention of the Board of Education, and without ay the two organizations arranged to work to-ther—the board giving Miss Wetmore's services special teacher and supervisor, the Association of mmerce providing the pupils. Splendid coopera-n that, in a far-reaching plan to Americanize icago's foreign-born!

The next day work began. Miss Wetmore en-led under the school board her factory classes and arted more. In three months she had thirty-eight groups in industrial plants, in six months a hundred and fifty, while the teachers grew in number to thirty. And the end is not yet; for there is today a long list of factories waiting for their English classes to begin. Packing houses and tailoring shops, coke and soap and electric light plants, department stores and printing establishments, twine mills and roofing companies, all the great industries of Chicago are represented.

THE whole Board of Education is helping this new department, called "day classes for the adult foreign-born." They open a school-house when the need arises. They give time and friendly interest. Most of all, they give a special training to these special teachers—lectures and visits to the factory groups, the course given over and over to meet the increasing demand.

A splendid plan—on paper—for the Board and the Association of Commerce. But how does it work in practice? What say the employers?

The cooperation of Chicago's factories in this work of Americanization is amazing. Of the most valuable things they have, time and space, they give generously. A class that begins in a half-hour of the men's time, at noon or between shifts or when the day's work is done, soon changes to fifteen minutes of company time and fifteen of the employees'; and before long it is all company time. One superintendent could fit the lessons into his schedule only by putting the class at half-past five, so he had the nurse serve hot coffee and rolls to freshen up the men. Some plants have regular school-rooms, but if ideal conditions are not available the work goes on as best it can. In some out-of-the-way corner, with people coming and going, with machinery banging away, you will find eager groups talking about the flag or the safety-first signs about the factory, or the newspaper headlines of the day.

"If you can change your appointments and come to us from one to two," said one manager, "I'll change my lunch hour and you can have my private office. Then when we put up our new building we'll plan just what you want for a classroom."

SOMETIMES it is the little things that best show the attitude of the owners of the factories. At one plant the whole force of carpenters was put to work on special benches for the English class. "Why not add a narrow molding," asked the executive, "so the pencils won't roll off to the floor?"

When one teacher suggested notebooks, so that her pupils could keep their lesson sheets together, the only question was, "What kind?"

"Slipsheet, please, about seven by nine."

The next week the books were ready, with leather covers and the name of each man stamped in gold letters. "If we go into this thing," the superintendent said, "we mean to do it right. Nice books will give my men more pride in them." And when she saw the men's faces, the teacher agreed.

The head of one great factory stated the point of view of these employers: "Our people were in the dark, these classes have let in the light. They were numb, now they can feel and move about intelligently. They were dumb, now they can talk. They used to stay in the rut where they were placed by the foreman and did only what they were told, now they can think. Americanization's worth money to our firm! This was one of the first plants in the city to teach English. Now we have sixteen classes a week, all on our time!"

Only one executive disagreed, but his classes too were on company time. "Worth dollars and cents?" he said. "It isn't. Why, these foreigners never stay very long in one job. They come and go—six months is a long time here, and some stay only a few weeks. We're not doing this for any selfish reason, it's for Uncle Sam. I figure they'll be better citizens after they can talk and read in English, whether they stay in our plant or go to our neighbors' or our competitors'. It's our bit, making them all talk American. And when our new shifts are arranged, I'm going to start a class for our gang-foreman."

IF SUPERINTENDENTS are eager for this new work, they are only half as eager as the men themselves. Classes grow so rapidly that they are divided and subdivided. There is practically no tardiness, almost no absences save those required by the factory work. The men petition for a longer lesson time, for three days a week instead of two. Gladly they come earlier or stay later or sacrifice part of their nooning. And how they do appreciate the class and teacher that come to them, with no going out at night, or dressing up required! How they appreciate, too, the special lesson sheets written by Miss Wetmore and printed by the Association of Commerce—easy sentences using the words they need every day about their homes, their factory work, and what is happening in the world!

And equalling the eagerness of employers and employees is the zeal of the teachers. "Don't you like my class?" said one of them to a visitor. "They're so anxious to learn, it makes my heart ache that we can do so little for them. I want to bring them close to America and lift them right up!" And on her face was the look of the great teacher.

NOR is this new approach to Americanization limited to Chicago and to Miss Wetmore's classes. The pupils themselves are spreading it.

"When you go home, talk English," says a teacher.

"Say, lady," queries a big Slav from the back of the group, "how I speak English home? No speak my woman."

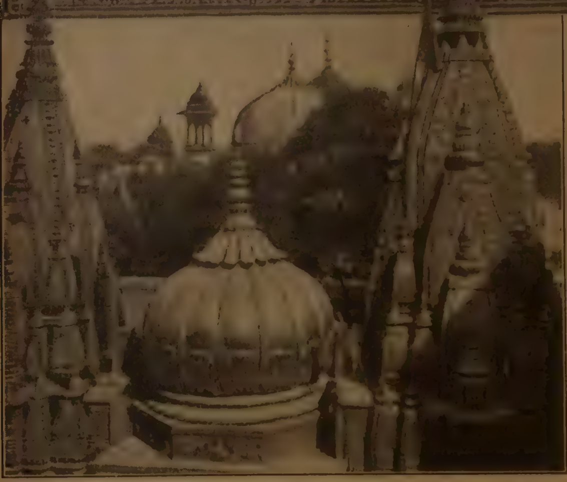
"That's just it—teach her what you've learned today."

"Yes, yes, lady, we will," came the answer in concert.

Each training class too spreads the work. People come to the lectures from Chicago's suburbs and from nearby towns. One class conducted by the State Council of Defense numbered more than a hundred down-state people who started work in their home communities.

It is not only in Chicago that the war has brought a new sense of the need for Americanization. It is coming everywhere. Boards of Education, women's clubs, Chambers of Commerce and factory owners are all cooperating to take the English teacher to the pupils. And through this "Talk American" movement will come a uniting of our peoples, to make us a true democracy, with every person helping, every person sharing, in the life of the community.

IN THE LAND OF THE GREAT MOGUL



The Golden Temple at Benares, India

By Rev. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

President World's Christian Endeavor Union

OF ALL countries beneath the sun, India is the land of fiercest contrasts. Light and shade, black and white, unbounded riches and incredible poverty, princes and paupers, nabobs and pariahs, we find everywhere. There are no neutral shades, no softened colors. As the intense and glaring sun of India casts a midnight shadow, so there are social and industrial shadows no less dark.

I have made three visits to India within the last thirty years, and though short, they have been long enough to impress me profoundly with the beauty and the ugliness, the wealth and the squalor, and above all, with the vast possibilities of that teeming peninsula.

I have seen also great advances in the Christian movement. I have seen whole castes leavened with the Gospel yeast, and, to speak of the special cause which took me there, I have seen the Christian Endeavor movement grow from a few little societies to a great Indian Union numbering more than two thousand organizations and fifty thousand members. In 1892 many missionaries did not believe that an organized effort like Christian Endeavor was adapted to the crude, undeveloped young people of India, just out of heathenism, but now I think it is acknowledged with practical unanimity that it is peculiarly adapted not only to the young but to older converts, who are really young in Christian life, and who need the very training for which such a society is intended to give.

It has been found that in many small village communities not enough Christians can be gathered together to form a church, but that a little Christian Endeavor society can be organized where the members meet together to strengthen each other's faith, to read the Bible and talk about its truths, and to do simple acts of helpfulness in the spirit of the Master.

This idea is carried out in many places with most excellent results. In the Madura mission district some churches have nearly twenty out-district Christian Endeavor societies, and one, if I am not mistaken, has twenty-five such little satellites.

MY MEMORIES of India in 1906 are most vivid, and in many respects sad and painful; for it happened to be the year of the last great plague and famine. Leaving my family in Europe, this journey was made, unlike most of my round-the-world travels, alone. That was no year to expose those whom one loves to the pestilence that walketh in darkness. I did not realize myself the extent and virulence of the bubonic plague until I reached Bombay about Christmas-time, when I found the native population in a terrible panic. It was said that half the population had fled the city, and it seemed as if the other half were trying to get away, for the railway stations and grounds were crowded with frightened natives, waiting to crowd the third- and fourth-class cars which should take them to a place of comparative safety. Some of them had to wait for several days and nights before they could get standing-room in the closely packed cars.

Before many plague-stricken houses I saw little ineffectual fires burning on the sidewalk, a few live coals and sticks on which sulphur had been sprinkled. These fires were absolutely of no value, for it had not then been discovered that the plague was carried by fleas, and the fleas by rats, from house to house. When this was discovered a great crusade against the rats was ordered, and in many Christian Endeavor Societies "Rat-tail Committees" were formed, whose duty it was to kill as many rats as possible, and bring their tails to the government authorities as a tangible proof of faithfulness. Would that all committees could so be made to prove that they had surely been "on the job!"

IN THE missionary home where I stayed in Bombay I could hear at all hours of the day and night the monotonous and inexpressibly mournful chant of the Hindu funeral processions going by, and the long row of carrion vultures on the Parsee "Towers of Silence" were gorged with the bodies on which they had fed.

The plague, though a menace to all India, was largely confined to the Northwestern Provinces; but dreadful famine conditions prevailed in other places. While visiting a missionary of the Disciples of Christ in the Central Provinces a few weeks later our hearts were wrung with the gaunt and spectral crowd of starving men, women and children who every day crowded around the compound, hundreds of them, stretching out hungry hands for anything we could give them. All that we could get were some scant supplies of millet and other coarse grains. With these we would go the rounds putting a handful into each bony palm. They often did not take it home or stop to cook it, but gulped it down like ravenous dogs, though the raw grain added to their misery. How many such starving mortals have the unstinted benevolences of the readers of the Christian Herald helped to relieve, in almost all the lands beneath the sun!

In other parts of India there was plenty of grain, but inadequate transportation made it of no avail. Indeed, I remember going from this famine-stricken station to a little native state not far away, where there seemed to be plenty and to spare. This was one of the scores of native states, nominally free, with their own rajahs and laws, but under British protection, and where the British Resident exercises a wholesome restraint.

IT HAPPENED that, one of the days I was there, the young rajah reached his majority, his eighteenth birthday, and great ceremonial rejoicings were held. Though a Hindu, he was friendly to the missionaries, and we were all invited to the ceremonies and saw his people do him reverence, while he sat on a dais with his cupped hands in front of him, into which, with lowly obeisance, they put their offerings of rupees, worth about thirty-three cents, sometimes one, sometimes half a doze or more. He received them nonchalantly, as his right, with no expression of gratitude, and I was told that this was really his "pin-money," the revenues of the state being applied to other purposes.

Afterward he showed us over his great palace, which would have put the White House to the blush and swallowed it up two or three times. Then he took us to his menagerie and showed us his elephants, his lions and tigers. As he was inclined to poke viciously with his cane at the lions, I was glad to see the British Resident, who also seemed to be a kind of tutor, restrain him and say, "I wouldn't do that." Evidently British control was something more than nominal.

The next morning he sent his royal carriage with three prancing ho as a recognition of his regard for the missionarie take me to the railway station.

ANOTHER incident of this journey I shall n forget. Rev. William Carey, the namesake great-grandson of the most famous pioneer of mo missions, had asked me to go with him to a Chris Endeavor convention in the rice region of e Bengal, a part of the English Baptist field. I gl accepted, and, after a journey of two nights and a by steamer, houseboat and canoe on the Ganges its small tributaries, and then a walk of four or hours, we came to a little village of some forty houses, about half of them owned by Christians.

A commodious chapel made of bamboo and mat was the convention meeting-place. At two o'cloc the morning, Mr. Carey and I crawled into a nea hut belonging to a Christian, threw ourselves dow a heap of clean straw to get a little rest before meetings began. But even then the delegates begun to arrive, many of them having walked night. They brought their musical instruments, with their Christian songs made the night vo Soon after daylight the meetings began and contin all day, with a brief interruption for lunch. De tional periods were enjoyed, conferences held, dresses made, questions asked and answered, mu in a similar meeting in America.

Toward the end of the afternoon Mr. Carey, w was presiding, said: "Let us make a chain of love our friend from America." Whereupon he called verses about love from the Bible. They came, th and fast. "God is love," "Walk in love," "Love another," etc. These were written down in Bengali tongue on different-colored pieces of t paper, and skilfully glued together by the deft fin of small maidens, until they made quite a long ch

Then a mahogany-colored deacon in the back of chapel came forward, wearing few clothes, but w shining skin, well rubbed with cocoanut-oil, and, all the grace of a Lord Chesterfield, hung the c around my shoulders and said that he wanted m take it back to America, and to assure the Endea ers of America that we were one in Christ and l each other like brethren.

Was not that a beautiful symbol of fellowsh Soon the League of Nations will bind the whole w with a chain, if not of love, at least of friendship, the denominations are being bound more and m every year with a genuine chain of Christian love cooperation. Thank God for these chains of lov well as of prayer that are binding the whole wide w to his feet!

Soon after the chain of love ceremony was c pleted, the hundreds of delegates from the s societies of the Bheels of Bengal joined in "God with you till we meet again," and went singing their way to their own villages, some of them walk all the second night to get home, for there was no r for them in the little convention village.

Could any incident show more plainly the str compelling influence of the religion of Christ on c heathen hearts, than the pains taken by these Beng to attend a Christian convention? How many Am ican Christians would walk two days for the sake o few hours in a religious meeting?

When I went back to Calcutta and then the Baptist college at Serampore, I looked w new reverence at the forty great tomes in as ma ages of India, all translated under the direction at great scholar, linguist and missionary, the er cobbler of Kettering, William Carey the First, e "business it was to preach the Gospel and who led shoes to pay expenses."

y last visit to India, in 1909, was shorter than the s, but no less interesting, for its principal object to attend the Fourth World's Convention of stian Endeavor Societies in the great historic of Agra. Three World's Conventions had been previously at intervals of four or five years, the in Washington, the second in London, the third eneva, Switzerland.

think of holding the fourth convention in the t of heathen India was a bold proposition for the an Endeavorers, but missionaries and native stians alike eagerly desired it, and fortune, or er Providence, as usual favored the brave. It sed great interest in America, and though the th of the journey prevented many from attending, e fifty Endeavorers sailed from New York on the eland in October, 1909, for the journey around the d, whose culminating point of interest should be city of one of the great Moguls, Shah Jehan, the of the most magnificent building in the world, the Mahal, the tomb which the emperor built for his ved wife, Moom Taj. There were some six hundred other passengers on the Cleveland, for it was the first of the popular round-the-world excursions of the Hamburg-American line, by which travelers could put their trunks on shipboard at New York and take them out at San Francisco four months later, after visiting all the great nations of the Far East and a score or more of interesting historic cities. The Governor-General took a real interest in the convention, gave us the use of the beautiful flower-bedecked McDonald Park free of charge, the vice-regal encampment, consisting of four hundred tents—two of them great audience pavilions seating two thousand each—and even paid for their transportation from Calcutta to Agra, a thousand miles distant.

IT WAS indeed a picturesque sight when the hundred American delegates reached the beautiful park one November morning. Four hundred missionaries, representing all denominations and many countries, had come together, and four thousand native Christians, over a hundred from far-off Burma, after a journey of nearly two thousand miles. As we reached the park gate, a native delegation met us with garlands of lovely flowers, which they hung around our necks. An Endeavorer on an elephant and another on a camel also greeted us, but many had come who could not afford even a donkey or a fourth-class seat in a railway train. They had come on foot, some walking a hundred miles and preaching the Gospel at all the villages along the way.

The temporary "white city" was laid out along regular streets, while near the center were restaurant tents, literature booths, and the audience pavilions, in one of which Hindustani was spoken, and in the other, English. Not far away was the great sordid native city with its beautiful three-domed pearl mosque, and its vast sandstone fort, in which ten thousand troops might be quartered and almost get lost. Surely it was a unique place for a World's Christian Endeavor Convention, the first of the kind ever held in India.

My space will not allow me to dwell long upon these memorable meetings. It seemed that every nation and tribe and language and people on earth gave glory and honor to Him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb.

The journey around the world was continued a week later from Calcutta, and in Burma and Java, Borneo, Singapore, China and Japan, in the Philippines and Hawaii, as previously on Madeira Island and Egypt, other intensely interesting sights were seen, and in many places Endeavor meetings were held, until in March we disembarked at the City of the Golden Gate, and bade adieu to our delightful companions of the Cleveland.

$2,000,000,000 Cotton Crop

MERICA'S cotton crop, including the cotton seed which it contains as a by-product, reached the record-breaking value of $2,045,251,868, ording to the annual report of Henry G. Hester, retary of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange. The ue of the cotton alone was a billion and some lions of dollars, that of the cotton seed some three dred and thirty-five million dollars. There is a rth of manufactured goods all over the world, and rush to supply that demand has pushed up the ce, and all the mills in this country are running are naming their own price for their goods. Mill ings for American cotton in the United States t year aggregated 5,880,000 bales. What the government may conclude to do with reference to the portation of cotton, wheat, corn and other articles reduce the cost of living, remains to be seen. The w South has arisen out of the ashes of the Civil ar an industrial giant, keeping pace in her supply clothing with the North in its bountiful supply of ead. Some writers claim that a plant answering to r cotton was cultivated in ancient times in the r East. The Hebrews were beautifully supplied th material for clothing with their wool and flax. is is a reference to the primitive clothing industry: he seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly th her hands." (Prov. 31 : 13).

Manhattan Rumseller Jailed

S THE world coming to an end? The proprietor of one of the most notorious and pestiferous inking-places in New York was fined $1,000 the her day, and sent to prison for six months for lling whisky to customers on the third of July, in fiance of the War Prohibition Law. Whether the ederal Department of Justice intended it or not, was wise to make an example of this particular sort. It was the saloon on Center Street formerly wned by Big Tom Foley. The saloons have ruled w York City absolutely for thirty years. There is o law of God or man that they have hesitated to reak. They elected the proprietor of this same loon as Sheriff of New York County to see that the xcise law was "properly" enforced against them. ow the proprietor of the same place is himself a uest of the prison. What is the difference? Uncle am has been authorized by the people to end the quor business, and that means the end of it. o one can tell the consternation to the liquor ealers or the encouragement to reformers that this entence will bring. Having attacked one of the citadels of the underworld, it might be well for the ederal detectives to look after the so-called upper orld, the fashionable cafés and hotels whose proprietors have been the most blatant fighters against the enforcement of the prohibition law. The liquor people have claimed all along that the non-enforcement of law is unfriendly to healthy morals. The Bible says so in these words: "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." (Eccles. 8 : 11).

Would Prevent Inherited Fortunes

IN HIS testimony before the House Committee on Interstate Commerce, Mr. Frank Morrison, secretary of the American Federation of Labor, undertook to describe what he considered an ideal democracy. He did not see any reason why wealth should be transmitted from father to son at death. He held that a man's fortune at his death should be appropriated by the state or community. Mr. Morrison overlooked the fact, which he might easily have discovered, that one of the deepest instincts of the soul is the love for one's family, which in every true parent is stronger than life itself. However, a man's love for his family and desire to provide for it after his death ought not to be such that he would forget his duty to the poor and other righteous enterprises while living and after he shall have passed away. If a man make no will, the state hands his possessions over to the nearest kin. The good Book puts supreme importance on the instinct which makes temporal provision for the family: "But if any provide not for his own, and especially for his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel." (I Tim. 5 : 8).

Carnegie's Fight Against Saloons

THE late Andrew Carnegie was one of the most persistent and powerful enemies of drink America ever had. In his talks to the workingmen in the steel mills, and in his addresses to the universities of Scotland, was the same note of warning against the danger of alcohol. Some time before his death the writer had an interview with him at his mansion on upper Fifth Avenue, in which he said that as a business man he saw what an enemy liquor was; that he had advised abstinence in every one, especially in young men, and that he had fought the saloon with all his might. Handing me a check for $5,000 for the Anti-Saloon League, he reminded me that that subscription had made $50,000 to that society in the last ten years. He also said that he had given $50,000 each to two other temperance societies, the names of which he did not give. As I bade Mr. Carnegie good-by he said: "I will treat you as I do the rest of my visitors and give you my personal card." This was the card: Printed in large letters at the top was "Andrew Carnegie on the Curse of Drink," and underneath, printed in words nearly as large, was the following: "The curse of drink is the cause of more failures in life than anything else, and while it may be possible to surmount any other faulty habit, the man who is a confirmed drinker has not one chance in a million of success in life. Liquor will conquer you a million chances to one if you give it sway." A leader in big business, Mr. Carnegie has been a leader in the war on the saloon on economic grounds. The ironmaster repeated this injunction of the wise man: "Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the cup, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." (Prov. 23 : 31, 32).

God in Peace Pact

IT IS claimed that there is no recognition of God in the Peace Treaty, not the slightest reference to him as the ruler of men and nations, nor any plea for his wisdom in guiding the unhappy peoples of the world into prosperity, righteousness, peace and love. It would surely be appropriate if the peace pact recognized the historical fact that Jesus Christ of Bethlehem has for 1900 years been the spiritual ruler of the world, and that no peace can be permanent without obedience to his commands and the inspiration of his life. He thus offers it: "My peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth give I unto you." (John 14 : 27).

The Fisherman Abroad

FROM Maine to San Francisco in inland waters and along the shore line multitudes of our citizens have enjoyed their vacation time in fishing, and fine sport they have had. God has so made man that work and play are necessary ingredients of his development and happiness. Nearly all of the great workers of the world have been fond of some kind of sport or other. The playful element has been as strongly marked as the industrial one. No one of our time worked harder than Theodore Roosevelt, and no one played harder and enjoyed his sport more than he. Most of the eminent divines of America have been expert fishermen. Christ selected fishermen to found his Church, partly because they were near at hand, and also on account of their simple life, mental vigor, rugged virtues and childlike faith. They fished for the market and usually employed nets, but they also fished with a single hook and line, as we learned by this incident: "Go thou to the sea, and cast a hook, and take up the first fish that first cometh up: and when thou hast opened his mouth thou shalt find a piece of money; that take, and give unto them for me and thee." (Matt. 17 : 27).

THE GIRL HE LEFT BEHIND

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

HE WAS leaning against the rail of the boat—a dreary figure muffled in an army greatcoat. Discouragement spoke from every line of him—his drooping shoulders, his bent head, his propped-up elbows. The Cynic and I, sitting contentedly in our deck chairs, regarded him with curious eyes.

"He certainly does look unhappy!" I said at last. "What's the matter with him? Is he seasick, or—"

The Cynic laughed, the short disillusioned laugh that had given him his name.

"Seasick nothing!" snorted the Cynic. "He's a war husband. And he's going home. That's what's the matter with him."

I stared still more curiously at the muffled figure.

"War husband?" I repeated, a shade blankly. And then—"Just what do you mean—war husband?"

"Oh"—the Cynic made a wide gesture with his hands—"a lot of fellows are war husbands. You've heard of war brides, I reckon?" Well, a war husband is the same thing, only masculine."

"You see, a good many fellows, when it was time to go overseas, got lonesome, and blue, and kind of discouraged—at least that's how I figure it. They got to thinking—'If I'm killed there won't be any one, much, who'll care!" Or they wanted to feel that there was somebody belonging to them who would be waiting for their letters. Some of them wanted a wife to make out insurance papers to.

"And so they got married. Sort of on the spur of the moment, a good many of them. They married the girls that they'd been taking to parties for the last year, the girls who were the most popular in the crowd, the girls that they'd never loved enough, before, to marry. And then they went overseas—some of them expecting never to come back, mighty few of them looking as much as a year ahead.

"A good many war marriages were the real thing. Girls and boys who really cared, brought closer together by a great crisis, and all that. But a good many of them happened because it seemed the dramatically right thing to get married while there was a war on, and a man was in uniform, and the bands were playing. And that fellow by the rail—well, he's in the last class. And he's on the way home!"

"But why—" I began.

The Cynic interrupted.

"He's grown up since he got married," said the Cynic. "That's what the war did for him and a lot of other chaps who went over as thoughtless boys and are coming back full-grown men. He's seen life and he's seen death. He knows other things now than the books that he studied in school. He's broader than he was, but the girl that he married hasn't changed. She stayed at home—she's just the same girl that she was when the war broke out. And he realizes it. That's why he, and a good many other fellows, are feeling blue and discouraged. They don't want to get home—to a spoiled life and a broken dream."

The Cynic stopped talking, with another of his short, unhappy laughs. But I, as I stared at the bent figure by the rail, ventured a last question.

"How," I questioned, "do you know that the girl has been standing still?"

The Cynic raised incredulous eyebrows and laughed for the third time. He didn't bother to answer.

IT SEEMS to be rather a common topic of conversation nowadays. Folk everywhere speak of the chap who went away a boy and came back a man. They talk of his mental growth, of his strengthened character, of his new idealism. And then they murmur something casual about his "little wife"—and the something they murmur is not vivid with praise. It is stilted, apologetic.

For folk everywhere are insisting that the girl at home has stayed still while the boy who went to war has progressed remarkably. They say the war husband has grown away from the girl he left behind him. They say he has progressed in a way that no woman could progress. But they're wrong.

FOR this time of war has been a remarkable period in the world of women. And women have been meeting it in a remarkable way. They have had unbelievable problems to meet—and they have met them gallantly and efficiently. The woman in business has a value today that she never had before, and the woman in the home has become a real factor. The nation has put many of its great affairs into feminine hands and has found those hands capable.

When the first call for men came there was a great deal of speculation about what would happen to a country drained of its younger generation. When the first batch of men sailed for France we noticed gaps in our well-ordered lives. The elevator boy was missing, the street-car conductor was about to enlist, the man in the bank had heard the call. And it was that way in every line of work. Even farmers were begging for help—even factories and machine shops were threatening to shut down.

And then the women stepped into the gap. Stepped in smilingly, willingly. A girl in a neat uniform s street-car fares. Girls in trim overalls took the pla the commercial life of the nation went on smoot ceaselessly.

To the women in the home came the same opp tunity. Girls who had driven motor cars for pleas stockings."

The outlook didn't seem particularly bright fo
William Allen. For everything that the matron ha said was quite true. Eyelashes and curls were Moll Jamison's chief claim to distinction, and she did enjo her breakfast in bed, and her darning was so ver bad that her mother used to protest, over the mend ing-basket, that it was easier to "do 'em in the firs place than to rip out Molly's crazy stitches and hav to do 'em anyway!"

Yes—the outlook was bad for William Allen! But being in love, he didn't seem to mind. And Molly though the town didn't give her much credit for it was a delightful person to be engaged to. Her fluffy curls were very pleasant when they nestled against one's shoulder.

AND then war came into the town. And the women who had gossiped so earnestly took to speaking in undertones about training-camps, and enlisting, and the draft. And in the midst of it am Allen, very straight and splendid in a new rm, married Molly Jamison, who was more than y in white organdie, and sailed almost immely for France. Other boys went with him—a many other boys.

d so sad days came to the town—sad, worried, days. Perhaps it was because they were such days that the town did not notice at first the ge that was taking place in William Allen's wife.

s hard to explain the change. For it was a hological one, mostly. But I can tell you what y Allen said to me the other day as we dried the er dishes in her scrupulously neat little kitchen-while William, back from France, waited for us he front veranda.
When Billy's letters" (the town had hated, before war, the way that she shortened his dignified e to Billy!) "when Billy's letters began to come to me I realized, as I never would have real-ordinarily, that we didn't nearly—match. There a quotation in the first letter that I knew should been familiar to me—but it wasn't. And there long words on every page of it that meant nothto me.
I looked up the words and the quotation. That the first step. And then I began looking up r words. And when Billy wrote home that he ed he had me to keep his clothing in order—well, rned to mend and to darn, so that he'd never know useless I really was. And when he told me that thought of me, pure and good and clever, at home, keeping him straight, well, it was then that I to work hard to make his ideal of me come true.
I learned housework, and I took an active inst in church affairs. And I made bandages and ted a club for some of the girl workers in a muni-s factory that suddenly grew up on the outskirts ur town. And in my spare moments I studied.
tudied—don't laugh!—arithmetic, and spelling, the classics. And in time I got to know some-
g. And when Billy came back—"

ILENTLY, carefully, she dried the last of the dishes that I had finished washing. It was only as she ung out the dish towels and hung them to dry that spoke again.
'Billy, bless his heart!" she laughed, "doesn't w that I've changed, because I've made myself into at he always thought I was. But I have changed.
e war"—the laughter quite died out of her voice—
"has broken millions of lives. But it's made mine into something worth while!"

And then, arm in arm, we went out to the veranda where William Allen waited for us. And when he rose, and looked at his wife, and smiled—then I knew!

MANY of the men who think that they have grown away from their wives have something of a shock coming to them when they get home to the cottage—or apartment—that they left. They'll find that cottage or apartment running more smoothly; they'll find that a certain system has crept into their home lives. And they'll find that the girl who has been waiting for them has been waiting constructively.

He'll find perhaps that his wife instead of hanging on his smallest word will be in a hurry to keep an appointment with her war-work friend, Mrs. Rockerbilt

The man who comes back to take up the threads of a life that he has gone far past in his months of European rapid transit will find that things have been moving back home. He'll find perhaps that his wife, instead of hanging on his smallest word, will be in a hurry to keep an appointment with Mrs. Rockerbilt, who was in her chapter of the home service unit.

"I taught Mrs. Rockerbilt to roll bandages," she will say sweetly, "and we've been very good pals ever since. So, dear, I'm afraid you'll have to get one of the boys to go with you to your meeting this afternoon at the City Hall."

No, the girl at home hasn't been standing still. She's been breaking some speed records in development, too. She's been making herself into a bigger, better person to fit into a bigger, better niche in the bigger, better world that her husband has been fighting for.

The man who left his home to fight has certainly done all that folk are claiming he has done. He has met his big hour bravely; he has fought against overwhelming odds; he has tasted the bitterness of failure and has won, through that bitterness, the sweets of conquest. He has looked, out there on the battlefield, into the very eyes of God. And his ordeal has strengthened him—has brought out latent powers and unguessed talents and a marvelous resistance. It couldn't do otherwise.

But all the time he has been going through this ordeal the fighting man has been in action. He has had the excitement of the moment to keep him up, the thrill of achievement. He has known the brilliant forgetfulness of self that made winning the war a possibility. And the girl he left behind him has had none of those things to keep her going.

FOR don't think that the girl at home was too far from the war to know the meaning of it and the horror of it. The girl at home has been battling side by side with her man overseas. She has prayed through the long silent nights, hearing in imagination the shell fire that was torturing his ears. She has wondered, every time it rained, whether he was warm and dry or whether he was in a muddy trench getting damp feet and a sore throat. Her down quilt had seemed a sacrilege to her on winter nights, because she was afraid that he was cold and hadn't enough covers. And she has searched the casualty lists every day with horror gnawing at her heart and death lying gaunt in the soul of her.

The man who went to war could never dream just how many moments of agony the girl he left behind him has known. For man psychology is different from woman psychology. He'll never guess how many bloody roads her feet, that never wandered from the home town, have traveled. He'll never know that she, too, has looked deep into the eyes of God without ever seeing a battlefield. He'll never understand that waiting—just waiting—is the hardest fight of all.

But he will know when he gets home that his fears are groundless, that the girl he left behind him has been keeping step with him. He'll know that she's more of a real comrade, more of a pal, more of a woman than she ever was before. And perhaps he'll wonder why!

A World League of Bible Societies

F THE time has come for nations to league themselves together to secure universal peace, and for churches, widely differing in many respects d as far separated as Asia Minor and America, to fer on matters of faith and order, is it not time for e Bible Societies of the world to unite in mapping t a world program of translation, supply, and stribution? For, after all, they believe that peace ust come through the acceptance of the great blical precepts, and certainly Christian faith and der has no higher authority than the Sacred Scripres. The times are alive with new ideals, new plans, w movements, and there is urgent need that these all all be influenced and shaped by the message of e Bible.
All of this was fundamentally in the minds of the anagers of the American Bible Society when they cently proposed to their older sister, the British d Foreign Bible Society, an association of the tional Bible societies of the world. There had alays been cooperation, but it has not completely evented duplication. There has always been comon counsel on international matters, but it has ever resulted in a completely unified program.
he time has come for some sort of organization of ese societies which have a world outlook, in order at there may be more complete and efficient proseution of the work of world Bible supply.
There are a number of important matters which n be dealt with adequately only as the societies ke joint action. There is, first of all, the question f the fields in which the various societies shall prose-te their work. It is obvious that in an undertaking this character duplication should be avoided. In arge fields such as China or India, there may be lenty of room for several societies to operate, in hich case the territory might be so subdivided that arge and easily accessible centers may not be over-leveloped while distant and difficult places are poorly vered or neglected altogether. A unified study st be made of the entire world and a program apped out indicating the most needy fields and the lative urgency of the work in each. The recent ar, which has changed the map of all Europe, has o created many problems in regard to Bible supply.
n the Near East, for example, hardly a Bible has een printed in the last four years. The whole work of Bible supply must be rehabilitated there. In other places the need may be as great. No one society can determine the wisest policy for adjusting the Bible program to the new world order.

IN THE second place, there is a great need of joint action in the matter of the translation and revision of the Scriptures. The Bible has been printed and circulated in about 650 languages and dialects, but the whole Bible has never been translated into each of these languages. Should it be? If not, why not? What new people are there in distant and isolated places who have never had any part of the Scriptures printed in their peculiar dialect? Who will search out and provide for these, unless there is some great joint effort? It must be remembered that the missionaries have reduced some of these dialects to writing as a part of their pioneer work, and the Bible is the first book that these tribes have ever known in their printed language. Sometimes, under these circumstances, the work is quickly and perhaps crudely done. There has been development in these tribal languages which may now call for revision of the original translation. Who knows just where revision is required? Even in some of the major languages, translations were hurriedly done in order that the Christian propaganda might be promoted without delay, and perhaps revision is needed even there. Also, in the course of the years, languages are modified, and even in the normal processes of things revisions are required. Who can find an answer to all these questions unless there is joint action of the great societies concerned?

IN THE third place, a determination must be made of the various agencies to be employed in the distribution of the Scriptures. Many methods and devices have been set up with a view to circulating the Scriptures to the farthest ends of the earth. Have these been adequate? Have they always been wise? May it not be possible to discover new and more effective methods? Uniform policies should be established in the use of colporteurs, in the mapping out of their fields, in their methods of handling business, in the matter of their remuneration. Much may yet be learned from the modern methods of salesmanship which will be readily applicable to the Bible program. Joint consideration is imperative if the most effective and far-reaching policies are to be discovered and put into operation.

In the fourth place, there should be considered the relations to governments in undeveloped countries. Would there not be greater opportunity for the Bible Societies in association to press forward into new territory, rather than to attempt separately and independently to establish individual relations with governments in undeveloped areas?

In the fifth place, could not there be presented a joint appeal to the whole Christian world for the support of Bible supply and distribution, if the societies could act in unison? Would not such an appeal make stronger impression than at present upon Christian men and women everywhere? And would not the people of non-Christian lands, among whom Christian propaganda is most largely promoted, be greatly influenced by the joint action of these several united bodies?

The American Bible Society is firmly convinced that the hour has struck when there should be concerted action in all of these matters. The churches in America are in the grip of a great movement looking to a consolidation of all the Protestant missionary movements in this country. Its vision is world-wide. Its momentum is gathering force daily. With the vision, purpose, and spirit of this movement, the American Bible Society is in most cordial sympathy.

Already surveys are being laid out to attempt to discover the needs of continents and nations, and these surveys call for knowledge concerning the need for the Holy Scriptures throughout the world. When these surveys are completed, the society then stands face to face with the question involved in supplying these needs, questions of new versions and revisions, greatly increased production and widespread distribution. It prefers not to undertake this alone, and for this reason it has invited the joint action of the other great Bible societies of the world. By associated action in each line more might be accomplished, or a multitude of new friends might be raised up in every land who will be awake to the spiritual needs of the world and rejoice to participate in this service.

The Great Fundamental

TEXT—John 6 : 29. "Jesus said unto them, This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent."

OURS is a day in which the real fundamentals in life and religion have taken on new importance. We stand upon the threshold of a new era, in which all human relationships mean more than ever before. It is an era presenting an outlook filled at once with wondrous hope and tremendous dangers, for it is made up of social, political and moral conditions, which make it possible for almost anything to happen. And only as the real fundamentals which must prevail between God and man and man and man are recognized and heeded shall we be able to interpret our duty, determine our course and grapple with the problems which the times have thrust upon us. This is distinctively a day for Christ's man—the man who possesses the spirit of the Master, accepts his teachings and seeks to know how best to apply them to the unsettled social, industrial and political conditions which prevail everywhere. It is a day for Christ's man—the man who has been in the heights with God for the divine vision and is now ready to go down to the surrounding plains where the peoples of the world are struggling, and make known to them the vision, tell them the Father's plan for living together in love and peace and good will. But the first essential is that more men shall climb the hill where the vision may be had, that they shall recognize and accept for themselves the Great Fundamental in establishing any and all right relationships Godward and manward. The Master lays down this Fundamental in our text, and to this let us turn.

DEEPLY concerned were the Jews with the things which they should do that they might inherit eternal life, and in the context in which our text is found they had asked Christ to enumerate unto them those things. The Master's answer is a most striking one. With one stroke he discards the word "works" and substitutes the singular, "work." The thought of the Jews could be summed up in the word "do," believing that by "works" they were to have entrance into God's Kingdom. They laid stress on "works"; Christ put it on "work." The Jews were thinking of their hands, Jesus of their hearts; for well did he realize that what they did would be determined by what they were. They were concerned with "doing"; the Master with "being."

In short, Christ's call in the text is unto faith in himself, for faith Christward is the great fundamental in the relation of a soul to God, in teaching a man how to be a brother in the truest and widest sense of the term to his fellows. It is our greatest "work."

It should be noted in this connection that Christ's call to faith is in the verb form, rather than in the noun. There is always a subtle shade of difference between a noun and its cognate verb, which is true here as regards the noun "faith" and the verb "believe." In the book of John the verb "believe" is used in some form more than ninety times, while the word "faith" is not found in his entire Gospel. The noun "faith" (pistis) is abstract, cold, lifeless; the verb "believe" (pisteuo) is full of action, energy, life. Indeed, faith is a military term; it demands the spirit of action, of heroism. Hear the injunction of Paul: "Fight the good fight of faith." And again "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." A life of heroism is depicted, the greatest, I believe, of which the soul of man is capable; for greater is the heroism of faith than that of love, or principle, or duty, or repentance.

Well do those know who are enlisted in the fight of faith in Jesus Christ that the struggle reaches from repentance at Calvary to the crown of victory at Olivet. Thus Jesus declared, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." It is the thought of the "chivalrous knight riding forth in the promising dawn, with waving plume and glittering lance, to do or die in his own or his Master's honor."

FROM the days of Abraham, God had been preparing the Jews (and through them the world) to believe on his Son when he should come, so telling of him in prophecy, so describing him, so pointing out the world's need of him, that mankind would recognize and accept him when he appeared among the sons of men. Thus it is not to be wondered that there were only two things at which he marveled during his life among men. He marveled at the general and persistent lack of faith in himself on the part of the Jews; and, when he discovered a simple, implicit faith in a centurion, he marveled that he had finally found such faith. It is significant, also, that when Christ told the disciples of the coming of the Holy Spirit, he defined his first ministry as that of "convicting the world of unbelief, because it believed not on Christ."

Faith in Jesus Christ, then, is the Great Fundamental in the spiritual life, in the soul's relation Godward and in understanding its relation manward. Love may be the sweetest flower to blossom in a Christian's life, but faith is the root from which it springs. When the enemy of the Christian's life makes his attack and lays his ax at the root of one's hope and love, joy and usefulness, his faith is attacked. For when faith is destroyed, all else droops and dies.

Note how vital and comprehensive is faith in all of life's spiritual relations: "By grace are ye saved through faith"—salvation comes through faith; "Being justified by faith we have peace"—peace comes through faith; "Having a righteousness of God through faith"—righteousness comes by faith; faith explains the mystery of manifold trials; "This is the victory that overcomes the world, even our faith."

When Paul would exhort the Corinthians in a final word, he wrote; "Watch ye, stand fast in the faith." And when he would commend the Romans, he said to them, "I thank my God through Jesus Christ for you all, that your faith is spoken of throughout the whole world." So, too, when Jesus told Peter that Satan was to sift him as wheat, he assured Peter in the words; "But, Peter, I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not."

When the writer of the book of Hebrews hung the walls of that gallery with the pictures of God's heroes and heroines, he prefixed the names beneath the portraits with one and the same word—"By faith." It was "by faith, Abel"; "by faith, Enoch"; "by faith, Abram"; "by faith, Joseph"; "by faith, Moses"; and so on down through the long list. So, we might add, By faith, Peter and John and Paul, Carey and Morrison, Livingstone and Judson, Paton and Pitkin—and a thousand others who endured as seeing him who is invisible—have through faith had part in working the miracle of changes which has taken place wherever Christ and his Gospel have been proclaimed.

BUT what is the faith of which Jesus speaks in the text? From what the Master says here, as elsewhere, one may define faith as that entrustment of one's life to Christ which brings assurance and confidence in Him and in the things he taught. It is that attitude toward Christ which brings pardon and peace and joy to the believer. It is the key that unlocks the things of God to our spiritual consciousness. It is the telescope bringing into our vision the hidden verities of God. Dr. Jowett has written: "Hope visualizes, faith actualizes, love vitalizes; hope contemplates a fountain, faith drinks from the fountain and is refreshed, love distributes the waters thereof to others."

That is it; faith "actualizes" the instinctive longings and hopes of the soul Godward; it brings God into the possession and experiences of the soul; it gives man the divine vision toward one's fellow men and points out to him how God would have him live in all human relationships and duties. Faith brings the spirit of Christ into the life of man, and re in bringing man into harmony with the will and pose of God. Faith is the path that leads man t mount where he gets God's vision for the world.

It is to this last thought that I would direct further attention, for it is this vision that the C tian needs, that the Church needs, that all men who set their faces to the task of establishing ju and righteousness and an enduring reconstruction of the present world-upheaval. History records us the fact that only those who have had God's vi have been able to accomplish the things of Go the past; that only such have been permitte furnish any genuine uplift and safe guidance for sons of men. Nothing is so essential for true lea ship today as real vision. Many can speak, b think; but who among us can really see? Ru puts it this way; "For every hundred who can one can speak; for every hundred who can sp one can think; for every hundred who can th one can see."

The life story of scores of men are recorded in Bible, but apart from the Master, there were seven who had great vision: Abraham, Joseph, Mo David, Isaiah, John and Paul. These were the whom God used most largely in laying the foundati of his Kingdom; they were in a significant man those who struggled up the path of faith into mount from which they caught the vision of G and could therefore be used of God in a large w So has it ever been. Men of faith in God, who h caught the divine vision, men who have realized themselves the unseen verities of God, have b the harbingers of progress and blessing among peoples of the world. And this has been true in b the spiritual and material realms. Such men have b the leaders, the pioneers in every forward moveme they have been those who could see the existence verities invisible—nay, unbelieved—by others. Su men God seeks, for such he can use.

No day is just a common day, no life is just common life, no opportunity is just a comm opportunity, no duty is just a common duty to h who has had his eyes opened to the visions of fai We limit God, restrict his truth and his work, withh his blessings for ourselves and others, because we f to place our hand in the palm of the Master and cli the Hill of Faith from whose heights we can get God distances. How much the Christian and the Chur and the world need those distances today! H much we need God's vision, clear, intense, f reaching in this hour of great uncertainty and disco tent, this hour in which men are seeking to know t sure way, the better way, the right way!

GOD calls his Church into the Mount of Visi today. He is bidding it take the path of fai and come up into the heights where it can see as sees. A young man who pored over books in an offi in a skyscraper in New York consulted an oculi because of trouble with his eyes. After a caref examination the oculist pronounced his eyes norma and in no need of glasses. "You do not need glasses he said, "but distance. Every noon hour, go to th top of your office building and spend at least a ha hour in looking up and down the Hudson, across th bay, over into New Jersey. Give your eyes a chanc at distance. Do this regularly every day, and yo will have no need of an oculist for years to come."

How many of us have concerned ourselves almo entirely with interests that center in our own happ ness and welfare, with things in our own immediat community, having lived within our own small circl the radius of which never runs beyond where we ca walk by sight! Nominally, we believe in Christ though actually we have thus far failed to follow hi along the pathway of faith which leads up the hill—often a rough and rugged way—to where our horizo becomes God's horizon, and we get his view of th ends of the earth and the need of all mankind!

Nineteen hundred years have passed, but th words of Christ to the Jews, concerned about wha they should do, become an imperative message to thos of us who, today, are likewise concerned about wha we shall do in this time of unprecedented world upheaval and unparalleled opportunity. And whil there are a thousand things we may and will d there is one fundamental we must observe, one thing we must do if we are to do wisely and best in any and every undertaking in behalf of our fellow men and the Kingdom of God: we must come into close touch and keep in close touch with the Master; we must believe on Him whom the Father hath sent.

BLESSED ASSURANCE!

By VICTOR E. BECK

I DO not know what I shall say
  When I have reached maturer years,
As I survey my youth's brief day,
  Its pains and pleasures, doubts and fears:
I only know, as evenings go,
  The time is swiftly drawing near
When Christ shall wash me white as snow,
  And gently wipe away each tear.

I do not know what thoughts will move
  My being when at last with God
I stand, and from the home above
  Review the path that here I trod:
I only know, as evenings go,
  The time is swiftly drawing near
When Christ shall wash me white as snow,
  And gently wipe away each tear.

Keeping Young

SUNDAY. Ps. 92 : 14. "They shall still bring forth fruit in old age." I wonder if Mrs. Humphry Ward is quite right in a word she has l of Mr. Stopford Brooke. It is d in her recently published reminis- es of a very crowded life. She says ; Stopford Brooke's old age was "a mph in the most difficult of arts. was young to the very end. He knew t to give up and what to keep, and freshness of feeling never failed." n wondering if the word "art" gives right interpretation. The word ts" seems to suggest too much rt, too much careful purpose, too ch anxious design, to explain some- ig which ought to be very natural. sometimes hears of people who are ying to keep young," and their ef- s are frequently not a little pitiful. ey force themselves to go here and re, and constrain themselves into this l that mood, and they usually get y weary in their endeavors, and the nkles gather about their spirits as y have already gathered around their ws. Their efforts are too mechanical. is something like a table fountain I e saw in a friend's dining-room. e waters were leaping and dancing strong springs in the heather; but s I could hear the click of the chinery. There was too much art, l too little nature and life.

like the Scriptural word better than s. Ward's; "They shall bring forth it in old age." That takes us from to nature, from the machinery into garden. The beautiful growths are tural and spontaneous. They are the vitable issues of certain deep and al relationships. "They that be nted in the house of the Lord . . . all bring forth fruit in old age." A rtain rootage is to result in certain itage. We are to abide in a certain l and the fruit is sure. "He that ideth in me, and I in him, the same ingeth forth much fruit." And the it does not become more meager as e years increase. That is one of the arvelous surprises of renewing grace; e spiritual fertility is maintained to e end of the days.

But there is even more than this. His leaf also shall not wither." That ems to suggest an antidote to the with- ing influence of the years. Even the af is to keep green. It is not to become re and yellow. And the leaf is the rly thing, the first thing, the thing of e springtime. "The tender leaves of pe!" These are to be upon the tree t seventy as they were at twenty. At utumn-time his spirit is to be bright ith the promise of the spring.

If there is any art at all it consists in st burying one's roots in the Lord. If e are rooted and grounded in him, the creasing years will have no terror. Ve shall face them with the alertness f children, and we shall greet the unseen ith a cheer. J. H. J.

The Unselfish God

MONDAY. John 16 : 13. "For he shall not speak of himself." One f the characteristics of a selfish soul is he inclination to speak of himself immoderately, if not exclusively. The great model of unselfishness is God. The Old Testament is full of the unfolding doctrine of a coming Christ. The Father speaks not of himself, but of his Son. At last the Son came, but he did not speak of himself. He revealed the Father, and spoke of Another, a Comforter, to come. The Comforter came on the Day of Pentecost. The Holy Spirit, true to the prophecy of Christ, spoke not of himself, but took of the things of Christ and showed them unto us. Each of the three Persons of the Trinity reveals the other. Is not this the office of the minister of Christ—not to speak of himself but of Another? It was so with John the Baptist, whose motto was, "He must increase, and I must decrease."

The only way to get out of the ever-present consciousness of self is to get into the ever-present consciousness of union with Christ. His life is the perfect type of unselfishness. To use a phrase of Sidney Lanier, it is Jesus who leads the world in "selfless chivalry." A great college president used to exhort his students often, "I beseech you, resist the tyranny of self, accept duty as the law of life, and live in the will of God." It would be difficult to imagine a more perfect counsel, and it had its effect upon innumerable lives. The Christian religion is emphatic upon this point. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth." "Seek not great things for yourselves." Not until Life's center shifts from self to other-self have we begun to learn the meaning of the Master's mind. C. C. A.

The Faith That Overcometh

TUESDAY. Dan. 3 : 27. "Upon whose bodies the fire had no power." What was the secret of the fortitude of those young men? How were they able to withstand in that evil day? It was revealed 700 years later by the inspired hand that wrote the rollcall of heroes in the Seventh of Hebrews: "By faith they quenched the violence of fire."

And theirs was a singular faith. It was not built upon any promise, however great and precious; nor on any theological dogma, however true and worth standing for; but on a personal God. In him they relied so implicitly that, whether he delivered them out of the furnace or left them to glorify him by going up to heaven in a chariot of fire, they would in any case bow at no other shrine but his.

The faith that overcometh the world is faith in the personal God who has revealed himself in his beloved Son. He stands back of all truth, all righteousness, all promises, all reliances whatsoever; he is the Friend that sticketh closer than a brother, who in evil and good report never fails those who are loyal to him.

To live or die for him, what matters it? Ours be the faith that is ever able to say, "I know whom I have believed." D. J. B.

The Tyranny of Sin

WEDNESDAY. John 8 : 34. "Verily I say unto you, whosoever committeth sin is the scave of sin." Christ, the Truth, can make the world free from sin, but if we believe not him as the divine Saviour, we shall die in our sins. A physician said to a young man, "If you do not cut out your sins, you will be blind in six months." He replied, "Good-by, sweet world of light; I cannot give up my sins." Lust was his master, he was the slave. Appetite clutched his throat like a demon. He was the bondman in prison; passions were his jailers.

Only one Liberator can save the soul from the tyranny of sin. His name is called Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins. He saves the Magdalenes, the moral lepers, the thieves, defaulters, robbers, the persecutors, liars and idolators, the drunkards and murderers. He saves unto the uttermost all that come unto God by him.

Only two courses are open to the human traveler—salvation or slavery. Which shall it be? Ages of peace or moments of pleasure; harvests of fruitage or nothing but leaves? Shall we follow Christ to freedom, or surrender to the slavery of Satan? This is the great question of human destiny. It may be this night thy soul will be required of thee—shall we still yield to the embrace of monster passion, or seek the friendship of the mighty Deliverer? Hear him speak to you: "He whom the Son makes free is free indeed. Without me ye can do nothing." If you will seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, all other things essential to true happiness will be added unto you. E. W. C.

Grace of Mutual Forgiveness

THURSDAY. Matt. 6 : 14. "If ye forgive men, your Heavenly Father will also forgive you." An exquisite illustration of the tenderheartedness of the apostolic church, showing how freely the disciples forgave one another, is found in that opening scene in the upper room, when Peter stood up to address them. All were conscious that they had forsaken the Lord and fled. Not one uttered a taunt against the comrade who had been found out. They distinguished at once between the unhallowed remorse of Judas and Peter's repentance. What changed Peter's despair into a saving faith was the Lord's look, his message, his personal interview. And how different would have been the drama if backbiting had occurred! In Paul's astonishing words to the Ephesians, the Holy Spirit would have been "grieved." Wind and fire are symbols of God—strong and terrible symbols—but how quickly sensitive to atmospheric conditions!

Those men and women, who are to us so illustrious, were for the most part rustic and unlettered. They spoke the Galilean dialect; and Paul, who could hold his own with Kings and statesmen, tells us plainly that God chooses simple folk, not the wise and learned, to be his followers. If Peter wrote letters that are now immortal in literature, if John's vision revealed for all time the mysteries of heaven and hell and destiny, it was because these men, with no discernible natural gifts, were educated in the Spirit. Their only books were the Old Testament, and if their reading was limited, it was the more thorough. Their university was life, their college was experience, their tutors were hardship and danger. Genius was only their final reward—a gift from Him in whom they drew every breath. It was the reward of the Spirit in which they read and pondered.

The World's Greatest Preacher

FRIDAY. John 7 : 46. "Never man spake like this man." This is a great tribute, especially when we consider that it was spoken about Jesus by his enemies. It is seldom that a man's enemies ever pay so great a compliment as this to him. Of course there were great preachers before Christ's time, and there have been great preachers since his day.

The Old Testament taught the authority of God. Men were to fear and obey him. Jesus came teaching the fatherhood of God, trying to lead men to love him. Christ is the only one who reveals to us God at his best. We now understand what Jesus taught: that we are not orphans in a world of fate—we are children living in our Father's earthly house, loving the One who cares most for us.

If Christ revealed the greatness of God's condescending love, he also revealed the greatness of man's ascending power. Just as truly as God came down in Christ to man, man goes up through Christ to God. It was Jesus who discovered man's individual worth and taught him how God cared for every man as a man. Christ also gave manhood a new dignity, and showed the world the possibilities of fellowship with God.

Sin had been thought of as a transgression of the law—that is, an outward deed. Jesus taught that sin was more than that, and revealed it as an inward condition. He believed in the existence and power of sin. Sin is the greatest curse of the age, and this is the indictment which can be written across the skies: "All have sinned and fallen short of the glory of God."

Jesus came with a message of hope, not to destroy the lost, but to seek and save them. He was willing to leave the ninety and nine and go out for the one. The redemption of man is the divine objective of God. Christ taught, lived and died that he might bring many sons home to glory. W. W. B.

The Blessedness of Service

SATURDAY. Acts 10 : 38. "Who went about doing good." "Were you ready to die, that you jumped into a stormy sea to save that child's life?" said a gentleman to a sailor. "Should I have been better prepared, sir," the sailor replied, "if I had shirked my duty?" Doing one's duty is the noblest kind of readiness for death. This was the mission of our Lord: healing, saving, restoring and redeeming. "I come to do thy will, O God." To release the captive, to comfort all that mourn, to give beauty for ashes. Christ's followers are commissioned to carry on his Kingdom in the salvation that saves. We should have the spirit of compassion for the multitude, the burden for souls, the willingness to suffer, that we may help and comfort our brothers.

To be right and do right is a crown of glory that brightens in this world. What opportunities are before the Christian world to-day! Millions of our fellow men are in hunger and pain, are homeless and friendless. We should go or send to their relief. Don't say, "How shall I? Who is my neighbor?" Go and help immediately. You are your brother's keeper; therefore hurry to his relief. The needy world waits for saviours; be one.

It will not do merely to express a sigh of pity, a tear of sympathy; you must extend the personal touch. Then you will bless three—yourself, the needy one, and the Christ. Let us seek after the lost as Columbus sought for a lost continent, as Edison has searched for the wonderful forces of nature. What matters it if you suffer martyrdom for your belief and ambition? Remember, you are in a noble society, with Socrates poisoned, Paul beheaded, and Huss burned. These are they that came up out of great tribulation, but they came victors, with the cross carved upon their scepters of triumph and shining on their crowns of glory. They were more than conquerors, through him that went about doing good! E. W. C.

THE PLOT AGAINST PROHIBITION

IT WOULD be well for our Prohibition friends to keep the signal fires burning. Victory is not complete until the enemy is not only disorganized, but dispersed or captured. Now, the truth, as every one knows, is that the liquor interests have not yet abandoned hope. John Barleycorn's legions are still in arms. In many parts of the country, and especially in our big cities, the saloons are still keeping open house, and beer and whisky signs are still flaunted in the face of the passers-by. These saloons are open in defiance of Federal and State laws.

What is it that gives this boldness to the enemy, after having been, to all appearances, soundly beaten? We must look for the answer to come from those who have in the past been their friends—the politicians. The saloon has always been a powerful factor in politics, and it is loath to relinquish that power.

But there are even deeper reasons for this confidence and bravado on the part of the liquor interests. The secret of their defiant attitude is that they cherish the hope of securing a fighting majority in the State elections, which will assure the reversal in a number of States of the verdict which has made booze an outlaw. On July 21, according to "The American Issue," the Anti-Saloon League official publication, the Buffalo Retail Liquor Dealers' Association sent a letter to the members of the trade, urging them "to use all honorable means to defeat" the "dry" assemblymen in their districts, and "not to lie down, but to keep on fighting. Never surrender a privilege until taken away from you by force." This explains the continued open violations of the law by the saloon interests in the cities. State legislators who voted to ratify prohibition, according to this secret program of the liquor men, are to be "marked for slaughter" in their assembly districts. The constitutionality of the prohibitory enforcement law is to be widely attacked, in the hope of finding it vulnerable in litigation. An association has been formed in Texas, opposed to National Prohibition, which is to be the nucleus of a new pro-liquor party shortly to be organized. Meanwhile a campaign will be begun immediately to defeat the reelection of every legislator who voted for ratification.

They are versatile, these corps commanders and adjutants of General Barleycorn, in new and daring expedients. One of these is to organize a new Labor Party, with a platform against Prohibition. Every energy will be employed to elect a wet Congress in 1920, with the view of amending the enforcement law of 1919 at the earliest possible date.

There are good reasons for believing that a strong, silent propaganda is already at work to support those candidates for office who will serve the saloon interests and help to get prohibition repealed. It would be a positive calamity if any such plot should succeed. It would undo one of the greatest victories for national morals, health and prosperity that has ever been won on American soil. Let the Prohibition signalmen keep an eye out for the propagandists. We give warning in season.

SERVICE AND SACRIFICE

IN HUNDREDS of American pulpits the industrial crisis is just now furnishing a theme for discussion and exhortation. The rights and wrongs of Capital and Labor, the question of strikes, the obligations of wealth to the nation and the community—these and many other tangled problems, the aftermath of the world-war, are causing widespread trouble and vexation of spirit. Times without number the duty of putting into practice the principles set forth in the Sermon on the Mount has been urged as a panacea for all our business troubles. Thus far the advice, although absolutely sound, has scarcely raised a ripple on the surface of things.

Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, the head of the Food Administration, has frequently distinguished himself by utterances that show his capacity for grasping situations quickly. He has a habit, when he speaks, of hitting the nail squarely on the head. In a London paper he is quoted as having said recently that the one thing to be most greatly desired in the storm-tossed industrial world today is a spiritual revival. We need, he said, that the same strong sense of service which distinguished the Allies during the severest trials of the war be reawakened. The public consciousness needs to be shaken and aroused. He held that no satisfying solution of the labor troubles is possible unless the people on both sides can be reinspired with the conviction that all life must be regarded as a God-given opportunity for service, and not merely as a chance to make money. When patriotism ran high, the spirit of service was everywhere. These are needed now just as sorely as they were needed in war-time, before we can attain the right attitude which will bring true adjustment. In other words, Mr. Hoover's sweeping dictum means that the man who will not apply the same principles of service and sacrifice to the tangled aftermath is as bereft of patriotism as the man who plotted to enrich himself off the country's necessity in war-time.

ROYALTIES AT A DISCOUNT

AT THE critical moment when the Hungarian Government was without a head, a scion of the imperial Hapsburgs, Archduke Joseph, came to the front and announced himself as the leader they needed. The very boldness of the step stunned the Hungarians, and it seemed as though the Archduke would win. But the Allies thought otherwise. They had gone on record as according the right of self-determination to the peoples affected by the war, and the Hungarians, they held, should not be swept back into the Hapsburg net against their will.

One of the most convincing evidences of world change is found in the altered attitude of men of almost every race on earth toward royalty. No longer do they believe in the divine right of kings. The fierce light that burns around a throne has become a menace to all but a privileged ruling class. By sad experience, mankind has learned that the warnings given to ancient Israel, when, dazzled by the splendors of semi-barbaric races, they clamored for a king to rule over them, are true of any age.

If the people of Hungary evade the Hapsburg net they will be fortunate. It has been an intolerable burden and has enslaved millions in furthering its ambitions. Three of the most tyrannous and oppressive dynasties of which history has any record have collapsed in the world struggle. Half a hundred minor potentates have disappeared with them. Royalties are at a discount. Reigns of "blessed memory" are few. The time is coming when good citizenship and loyal, unselfish public service to one's fellow men will be more honored than the making of wars and the glory of conquest.

HE CHOSE TO BE "RIGHT"

LOUIS BOTHA, who died in Pretoria, South Africa, a few days ago, was of humble origin. Fame, however, knows no country, no nationality; and greatness frequently springs from the humblest surroundings. Botha was a plain, rugged farmer of the veldt, thoughtful in manner and slow of speech, but with an underlying honesty of purpose and love of truth and humanity that expanded with the years. His training in the rough college of human nature had nourished these qualities. The mightiest trees grow best where they wrestle with the storms.

Most of Botha's early life was spent in the Transvaal. His neighbors learned to trust the steadfast and loyal farmer, and when he was chosen as a member of the Volksraad for Vryheid, his broad and temperate views and his grasp of public affairs won him many friends. So careful and cautious was his judgment that it was said of him even by his opponents that "he was always right." Though slow to speak and slower still to act, they noted that in both speech and action he was uniformly successful in attaining his object.

It was not until the South African war of 1899 that the real qualities of Botha began to appear. Entering the war as a field-cornet, he fought his way so successfully that he was appointed as the successor of General Lukas Meyer, and in 1900 found himself pitted against General Buller, whom he defeated at Colenso and Spion Kop, although with a numerically inferior force. A few months later, on the death of General Joubert, the veldt farmer became the commandant-general of the Boer armies. He took a leading part in the reconstruction which followed. It was largely through his influence that the Boers became reconciled to the union of the colonies of South Africa; but although frequently charged with being disloyal to his own people, he sturdily stood his ground, and at last convinced them that it was a question of cooperating with the British in establishing self-government in South Africa and developing the country, or of losing all.

When the world-war broke out, Botha had again a task, this time a greater one than before, on his hands. German propaganda in South Africa was everywhere. De Wet, the famous Boer leader in the former war, had become pro-German and led in a movement which at one time threatened to make the whole of South Africa a German possession. Botha was the only man who could cope with the danger, and, together with General Smuts, he at last ceeded.

Botha has been compared with Cecil Rhodes, pioneer of empire in South Africa; but the me make-up of the man and the character of his v reveal more of the traits of General Grant in m ways. He was a clear thinker, slow to reach con sions, tenacious in holding to his purpose when it was reached. He planned far ahead and wo unceasingly to attain his objective. His own pe learned to trust him in all things, believing in rugged integrity and his determination to do right. To the Allies he rendered valuable assist throughout the long war, and won the admiration respect of all.

This is a matter for a quick decision, and we wo urge all to read the announcement thoroughly then to enroll for the Course. Do not permit opportunity to pass, but decide without delay. I a step which, having once taken, you will never re

Rev. John Roach Straton, pastor of Calvary B tist Church, New York, while calling at the Christ Herald offices in the Bible House a few days a expressed his warm approval of the announcement the Bible Course. He would take the earliest opp tunity to commend it to his people and to adv them to take up the Course. No one, he believ could fail to be greatly benefited by a systematic stu of the Bible under competent instructors, like Gray and his staff. Dr. Straton's example might followed to great advantage by ministers general who could render valuable service to their cong gations by calling their attention to the Bible Cou as it is set forth in the announcement.

CANADA'S LABOR SPOKESMA

OUR neighbors in Canada are hailing the Liberal leader, Mackenzie King, as a str man who has opportunely appeared to c with difficult present-day problems in the Domini He is even acclaimed as a Canadian Lincoln—a of the people. Till now, little has been known c cerning him; yet in a single day he has leaped in public view and made himself heard and his opinio respected. The platform upon which he was cho declares for recognition of labor on all governme commissions dealing with industrial policies, insura against unemployment, proportional representatio the re-training of wounded soldiers for industrial wo labor to be represented on Canadian railroad boar immediate and drastic action by the Dominion go ernment against food profiteers, a just franchise the restoration of the control of the executive to par ment, and the control of parliament to the people. regards the whole labor question as a world-proble in dealing with which ethical and human conside tions should stand above all others, and especial above those of a purely business or material natu

The time has come, he believes, when the gove ment of Canada must not be ruled by railroads or moneyed institutions or special interests; but it m be a government of, for and by the people—here used Lincoln's identical words.

Canada has its own problems, but it has not a which are shared in common by others outside of Dominion. It will be interesting, and let us ho cheering, to note how the new leader's policy wo out in actual application.

What My Church Is Doing for the Community

IRST of all, my church is known as "the people's church." A church where the "common people"—the poor, blind, sick, and afflicted—can come, knowing that no man, woman, boy or girl is respected for his or her wealth; neither are they looked down on for their poverty. It is a church where the whole Gospel is preached, by a preacher who is not afraid of the criti- of those within or out of the church.

y church is a place where the Word of God is studied and taught. The great Sunday school, an enrolment of nearly 4,000, is a most wonderful example of this fact. Three large buildings used for the purpose of teaching God's Word every Sunday. From the cradle to old age the Word ught and studied.

y church is a place of prayer. Thousands of people can testify to the power of prayers which are up from this place day by day. Many sick among the membership have been restored to health, use of the prayers of faith.

rsistent faith in God and his power is the keynote which permeates the entire church. Lots have bought, and buildings have been built, because of the faith that sees no difficulties, and knows ilure. "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

ithin a very short time a building will be erected by the church for the boys of Fort Worth—ce where they can go and be trained mentally, physically, spiritually and socially..

at is one answer to the question: "What shall we do with the boys?"

d my church wants to answer another question: "What shall we do with the girls?"

e way we are going to answer that is, another building will be erected for the girls and young s of this city; especially the working girls. There they can live among the right kind of sur- dings, socially and spiritually. It will be a place where they can secure the best of everything reasonable price. Then there will be no need for the average working girl to be tempted to take which belongs to another because of the high price that is demanded of her for the necessities fe. Neither will she have to seek for social life, for that will be furnished; and it will be the kind cial life that will help rather than hinder her in her daily work.

y church wants the multitudes to hear the Gospel preached, and for that reason we are now en- ng the main auditorium of the church, so none will be turned away because there was no room for . There was no room for the Saviour when he came to this earth. Sometimes there is no room im, even in our churches; but my church is trying to give him first place in everything—time, ght and money. On the corner-stone are these words: "Jesus Christ himself being the chief er-stone"—"Teach all Nations." B. S.

ost Wonderful Answer to Prayer I Ever Knew

A PROUD and aggressive mother with a heart full of mother love brought her twelve year old boy into the great man's study and asked:

"How can I start James on a great career?"

mes, a pale, slender child of twelve years, leaned timidly against his mother. He did not have appearance of possessing the strength and determination to battle with the discouragements, taches and drudgery that come with the achievement of any great career his mother might t for him.

What does James like to do, mostly?" asked the great man.

He would play all the time if I would let him," complained the mother. "I try to make him study he refuses to touch his books outside of school."

What kind of a career have you in mind for him?"

I want him to be a distinguished lawyer or a doctor or an astronomer," was the reply.

he great man smiled.

You like to play, do you, James?" he said, turning to the boy.

We've got a printing-press up in our barn," said James, suddenly alive with interest. "We print a lar newspaper. It's a peach. We've got ten subscribers, and next week, maybe, we'll have two more."

his was not news to his mother. That newspaper was the bane of her life.

Madam, are you a Christian?" asked the great manturning to her abruptly.

Why—why, yes, I try to be," she stammered.

Are you a believer in prayer—the kind of prayer that releases power? When you pray do you be- e your prayers will be answered? If you do I can as- you that your boy will have a great career. Let him with his newspaper all he wishes. He has already the first step. Later he will need your strong and unwavering trust in God to keep him at his ession. While he is struggling for recognition; n the public ignores his efforts; when he is waiting his wings to develop and is trying them, then you have to stand behind him, and if you pray believing the way will open for him, your prayers will be wered just as my mother's were."

he mother looked at him. This was not what she expected.

I don't believe I can do it—I never learned to pray that. Of course, I will give James every advan- money can buy."

Don't," interrupted the great man. "Let him work for advantages. Money has spoiled many a fine career."

hen the great man took a little "Daily Food" k from his desk. Opening it to the date of that day read aloud:

> "Delight thyself also in the Lord, and he shall give thee the desire of they heart." "O Lord, I would know that the way of man is not in himself; it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps."
>
> "Oh, Lord, I would delight in thee,
> And on thy care depend;
> To thee in every trouble flee,
> My best, my only Friend."

How do you like that, James?" he asked when he finished.

All right," replied the boy, although he had hardly erstood what he had heard.

"I will give you this little book if you will call me over the phone every morning and read me the verse for the day. Will you do that?"

James kept his promise. His mother heard him read the verses and pondered them in her heart. They bore rich fruit.

James became a young man. He was taken on to one of the greatest magazine staffs, and he gave his mother all the credit because she had stood behind him with faith, believing many times when he would have given up the fight. E. J. K.

The Best One-Dollar Investment I Ever Made

AS a child I was passionately fond of music, but was not aware of the fact that it could in any way be connected with affliction until one never-to-be-forgotten day when I was punished by being sent supperless to bed. And all just because I had energetically pedaled my mother's new sewing machine, leaving finger-marks on its varnished surface! But how could she know that "Nearer, My God to Thee" had been exquisitely rendered (albeit slently) while, with eyes fixed on the enlarged portait on the wall, I had pressed imaginary shining, white keys in exact imitation of our Sunday school organist?

Left to my own thoughts, I made a big resolve—to possess an instrument all my own! And when, the next day, I confided into the tiny, pink ear of our neighbor's baby that I wanted the job of tending him, I was accidentally (?) overheard by his mother, who hired me then and there at a salary of seventy-five cents per week! At the end of ten days I was taken ill, sent home and put to bed, but under my pillow reposed my earnings—a one-dollar bill!

Some time later I was engaged in building air-castles as usual, and had just come to the comforting conclusion that if a real organ was not to be thought of, I could get a perfectly good mouth-organ for less than a dollar, and with the rest of the money——

But here came an interruption in the shape of a neighbor who came to tell us of his plans to move out west, and that he would dispose of his household effects. I stood transfixed.

"Is your melodeon for sale?" I asked, chokingly, clenching hard in my hand the precious little wad.

"Wal," he drawled, "I figger to sell my stuff mighty cheap, and—"

"Is this enough?" I interrupted, and, astonished, he unfolded the moist, warm bill.

My father burst out laughing and our neighbor thoughtfully turned the bit of paper several times before replying. "It's a rasping old thing, and you been a mighty good little playmate to my Emmy, so"—I rushed forward—"I guess it's a bargain."

About this time the date was set for the first service in our little new brick church, completed except for the steeple and other finishing touches. The news that I could play had spread, and I was promptly elected organist. The tiny congregation sang the only song I knew three times. However, I promised to master one additional hymn each succeeding week, and before very long was familiar with the contents of the entire hymnbook.

Those years of persistent effort on the little old melodeon, coupled with added responsibility in church work, laid the foundation of my musical training. Today I am at the head of the largest music department in one of the principal cities of this state, thanks to that limp, crumpled bit of currency, which I should surely recognize should it cross my path again! What I Owe to My Minister

I OWE to my minister the respect due to his office and the trust and confidence due to his high calling as a man of God. I owe to him the gratitude due to one who has come to serve my family, my church, and my community, for a minister is a servant. I owe him obedience, for he is in a position of authority; and sympathy, for he is cut off from relatives and friends and tied to this town.

I owe him careful attention to his sermons and a disposition to be helped by them. I owe him growth in my Christian life and character; a cheerful, hopeful outlook; courage and optimism. I owe him cooperation and activity, to the extent that he approves; and I certainly owe him the prompt payment of as large a part of the salary as I can shoulder, so he can pay his bills, meet his obligations, carry out his plans, and be relieved of anxiety in regard to money matters.

I owe him encouragement in his plans for constructive work, and a quick readiness to help provide, not such equipment as would occur to me, but such as he himself wishes and requests.

I owe to my minister help to carry out his vision of the things he can do for God, not only in this community but also in the world. His vision is doubtless a world-vision, and a growing one. I do not have to inquire pryingly what it is in order to help it to come true, but only to seize quickly every chance to say yes to requests for equipment and other assistance. I should do my part to make it possible for my minister to concentrate on work for this community, or to regard this church as a center and branch out from it as his vision directs; to work through this church and community, directing their activities, or to go forth as sent by them and as representing them, to do in the world outside such work as they have not had the training to do.

Confronted with the task of choosing a vocation, a young man decides on the ministry, believing that it will give him the chance to help more people in more ways than any other calling. Still following the gleam, he wades through seven years of hard study and stands ready for his charge—stands looking forward! Oh, the sturdy hope in that forward look! the unquestioning confidence that that coming church is to enable him to do great things for God, that coming salary is to enable him to devote all his time to service! Doubts? Not one! It is a radiant vision! And I owe it to my minister to help that vision to grow brighter, not to dim it in any way. It was a vision of freedom and of opportunity, a vision of growth and of service, a vision of the cultivation and use of talents, and I owe to my minister the chance to do even that, i. e., cultivate his talents.

Would he not have time and money to cultivate and use his talents for God, if I paid him what I owed of money and service? Not I, alone, but all of us? But I owe it to my minister to do my part. E. S. R.

IN THEIR OWN TONGUE

A Story by MARY SHERBURNE WARREN

Part One

"MR. HARPER, you see, kinder spoiled us for the old-fashioned style of minister. When he began talking so slick about soils and crops and markets I thought he was doing it jest to get round us old farmers, and 'twan't till he informed me I wan't using enough copper sulphate in my potato spray, and to prove it made me call up the county agent, that I caught on he knew considerable besides preaching. If that young man could have stayed here ten years it would have meant a lot more money in our pockets as well as grace in our hearts. You're jest as good as the average minister, but we thought if we changed we might hit some one a leetle more like Mr. Harper. You see, about the only excitement we get in a place like this is changing ministers."

"Then you would gladly have lived without excitement in Fairfield for ten years if you had been able to keep my predecessor that length of time," suggested the Rev. Emery Clark as he rested his arm against the barnyard gate. It had just occurred to him that he had reached the age where two-mile walks were an unwise form of recreation.

"Excitement!" Daniel Holway drove his pitchfork vigorously into the earth and chuckled at the thought. "Excitement! It was jest about all the excitement we could stand having a minister keep a lap ahead of us all the time. One fall, for instance, three of the youngsters round here, including my Dick, that was planning to go to college, decided that studying was considerable work and the old folks needed them to home. We did, but we're kinder proud up on these hills, and we'd been banking on their going to college ever since they was in their cradles. I was worrying about it before Mr. Harper one day, and the very next Sunday he got up and preached a sermon about apples—yes, sir, apples—right in the pulpit.

"He said he'd seen apple trees that had never been pruned or sprayed or anything, but in Fairfield he seldom come across a tree that hadn't been given at least a common school education. They was pruned once in a great while and sprayed in the spring if the farmers got round to it, and bore eatable and salable apples if the customers wan't too particular. Then on a table up there by the pulpit he set out a plate of common-school educated apples that wan't nearly as big and red as Northern Spies ought to have been at that time of year, and was pretty well decorated with scabs and wormholes. Then, he went on to say, there was some farmers—he meant me for one—that pruned their orchards every two or three years and sprayed once every spring regular and cultivated more or less—and out come a plate of high-school educated apples bigger and redder than the others with not half so many scabs and with only one wormhole in the six apples.

"Then there was some men, he said, who believed in making real money from their apples—that was Seth Martin he was referring to then—and they knew they couldn't do it unless they pruned every single year so their apples could get all the sun and air there was, and sprayed four times a year to hit every conceivable kind of scab and bug, and cultivated their orchards as thoroughly as if they bore potatoes, and, in return for all that, they got apples that would feel at home at the biggest apple shows in New England, for they was college-educated apples. And when he slipped a plate of Seth's college-educated apples alongside the rest you ought to have seen us stare.

"I never knew before what spindling, moth-eaten apples I grew on this farm. Those Spies of Seth's were perfect—yes, sir, perfect—we examined them afterwards. Not a scab as big as a pinhead on one of them and, as for wormholes, I guess Seth's forgotten how wormholes look. Well, I was so busy reckoning how many barrels of lime sulphur I'd have to lay in the next spring that I never caught on what the minister was up to until I saw Dick exchange glances with John Wyman and Rob Turner. Yes, sir, every one of the three set off for college two weeks later, and two girls that had boasted that a high school education was good enough for them.

"Of course we was lonesome and had to work lots harder—but you ask Ma some time what the president said about our Dick when she took a little journey up to college one day last winter."

"Few college professors could have given you a more striking lecture or one that would have been productive of greater results, but I should hardly call it a sermon," observed Emery Clark when the deacon stopped to fan his glowing face with his hat. Thin locks of brown-gray hair rapidly changing to white were the only points of resemblance between the tall, slender, thoughtful-faced man in black and the farmer who was storing up breath for his reply.

"Yes, I suppose any college professor that knew as much about education and apples and young folks and had Mr. Harper's way of putting things could have done exactly as well. But we didn't get off as easy as that very often. That man gave us more of the Gospel and old-fashioned Ten Commandments preaching than we'd had before for twenty years.

"At first some of the folks didn't like such plain speaking, for it made them think more'n they was accustomed to doing, but they daren't stay to home for fear they would lose some illustration that would help them in their farming. One Sunday in May he told us that many of the sins that keep men and women from becoming what God meant them to be could have been brushed away in youth as easily as a farmer brushes off with his fingers the apple tree suckers that only a good-sized saw could remove ten years later. I wan't the only man that went round his orchard the next week rubbing off twigs here and there and trying to reckon how many hours of pruning that would save me the next spring. We knew Mr. Harper dropped that hint on purpose, and would be round to see if we was bright enough to take it. He was jest as interested in our farms as if he owned 'em."

"From what I have heard of Mr. Harper's methods, I judge he spent most of his time among his parishioners. I have often wondered when he found time to write his sermons."

Deacon Holway did not stop to classify his caller's observation. "Oh, he carried a pad and pencil round with him, and every leetle while he'd whip 'em out and jot down a few words," he replied. "I dunno jest how many hours he did spend in his study during the week, but his sermons always satisfied us. People kept growing better—why, if that man had stayed here ten years Fairfield would have been so much like heaven we shouldn't have felt natural.

"Did you ever hear about that practicing class he taught in Sunday school? Well, all the men twenty-five and up in the parish that went to church—and that meant pretty nigh all of 'em by the time he had been here a year—belonged to that class. Mr. Harper would teach the lesson, and then he would tell us how we could go out and practice it in the community and in our homes, and sometimes he would hit us a leetle closer than he had any intention of doing. And if anything needed looking after that wan't spoken of in the lesson for that Sunday he would take it up without waiting for a lesson on that particular subject. 'God is depending on you men to pull a husband and father through an hour of temptation,' he announced one Sunday right out plain like that.

"We stared as if we didn't believe him, for it had never occurred to us that it was our business to meddle in family affairs. But he gave us to understand that what was God's business was our business. So then and there we formed a glee club—object to save Jack Plumbly. According to the minister's instructions the committee that went down to invite Jack to be the leading tenor stayed so late that he never got a chance to run round the corner to see if the widow's woodbox was filled for the night. I'll wager that was the first time Jack's leetle wife had smiled real natural since the widow moved in three weeks before. Well, the women here most wore themselves out getting up entertainments so we'd have a chance to sing, and before we knew it we was having engagements out of town as well as in. I lost so much sleep I didn't know but I'd have to give up farming and rest daytimes. We thought we'd give Jack excitement enough so he'd be willing to spend his evenings to home when he had a chance, but it came pretty nigh working the other way—the more excitement he had the more he wanted. Jack was too crazy to sing to catch on to what we were up to, but I know the widow did, for she used all the power that considerable beauty and some brains had given her to win the game.

"It was the biggest fight this church ever put up, and I dunno how it would have come out if Mr. Harper hadn't sent off for the hardest anthem our choir ever tackled and asked us to try it at a glee club rehearsal, for most all the glee club were in the choir by that time but Jack. We started in with Jack sitting in a corner studying his part for a medley and twirling his watch chain faster and faster the more mistakes I made on the tenor. When the minister see that I couldn't read it, to say nothing of singing it, he takes the music out of my hand, and, with one of his smiles, passes it to Jack, who gets up and sails through it like a steamer through a calm sea.

"It proved to be so much prettier than anything we'd ever bought for the glee club that we tried it over and over as if we couldn't let it go. We took an old anthem to church the next Sunday, for we didn't half believe Jack would show up, but he did, looking sheepish enough until the organ played the first notes of the new piece. Then he threw back his shoulders, opened his mouth and struck in on the first solo part—and we held our breath, it was such music. Everything went all right until we got to the last verse, where we had to wait a minute for the bass to perform, and Jack happened to look down to where his two little girls were leaning forward and gazing up into his face, as if 'twas the face of an angel, and his wife was crying into her handkerchief. His voice trembled so after that that he just managed to get through—but we all understood. I guess the widow did, too, for she moved out west a month later.

"Now some ministers wouldn't have soiled their hands with that little affair, but Mr. Harper believed the Bible was given us to practice as well as preach. That was a leetle the worst job he had to tackle, for we're a pretty self-respecting "Ever hear how he got Tom Blodgett and hi to make up after that fuss they had over paperi kitchen? Mebbe I'd better let Martha tell that for she can set it off a leetle mite more fancy t can, knowing Elvira as she does. Now you se we are getting hungry for another man like Harper, for even Ed Spaulding had to admit wan't anything like the right kind of a minis keep a community prosperous and wholesome happy. We knew a man as smart as you coul another place easy and mebbe bigger than this, farming ain't the only occupation. But, as Martin said a month ago, it's considerably mo citing for us to know the minister may be coming the hill to see whether we're spraying often enoug potato blight. There ain't anything much eas neglect than spraying for something that ain't s its face yet."

"And I thought it was going to be so easy to here!" The words rushed to the lips of Emery as he turned from Hill Crest Farm and wende way back to the little village where he had live nearly a year. Through avenues of maples that country roads a joy to summer travelers, past g of farm buildings over which prosperity reigned, the sawmill and the post-office and general stor reached at last the house which was called by e one but himself and wife "our parsonage"; to it was "our home."

As he stood for a moment before it—shining in its recent coat of paint like the dignified ch beyond—there flashed through his mind a pictu several houses in which he had lived since he had tered the ministry. There in the August sun h most shuddered as he thought of one chilly study factory village; a cheerless dining-room in a unive town held him for a second more. In each he c readily recall some defect he had been powerles change. But "our home" was perfect—as perfe Seth Martin's "college educated apples."

The man winced as the simile forced itself u him. "And I thought it was going to be so eas stay here!" The words stepped forward again a

:RHAPS I feel deeply on the boy question. Perhaps I feel that there should be no corporal punishment, no ear-pulling, no bringing in of parental severity in the Sunday school, be- know that boys so treated will hate the class of love it, and will stay away unless forced . Perhaps I know that although the father near to control the boy's body, he can not mind from going wherever it likes, and that er what is said or done, a lad smarting from treatment will receive nothing but wrong.

ve I know boys. I am the mother of two. I aught them in the public schools, lectured to Sunday school institutes, and for three years en in charge of a junior class which has grown o to twenty-six and is still growing, because ld-fashioned enough to believe that, for chil- least, there is inspiration in numbers. I the superintendent to let us grow without n.

ht say that this class is the center of attraction, its disorder. I have never been obliged to cor- . I might say that they are not angels: in g ago, one was found in a neighbor's hen- and another puffed brazenly at his father's te.

IORS are easily kept in order by one who erstands and loves them. Time and thought rk win love and confidence. I send post cards ters on holidays and when out of town, visit when they are ill, send flowers and personal written in child fashion about the things in they are interested. It does not take so much is often consumed each day in a bit of gossip, believe the results are better. I give them a once a year and a picnic. All these things help, ncipally I plan to make the class period so ting that they do not think of anything else.

boys love stories. I use many and adapt the sson to them instead of trying to suit the boys lesson. We do no reading. Why should a child over hard words which he does not under- and leave the others who do not understand et? Why should they not fidget when they nothing to employ mind and body? And then acher can explain it so easily and make the stories real by applying them to every-day life. unday school teaching is meant to make us citizens and Christians. Then why not give hildren something to make their home and and play life better?

e we remember half of what we see and only a f that which we hear, why not give them eye ations as well as stories? When I held before ys a few weeks ago a small green apple with one speck, I asked: "What is wrong with this ?"

ey were interested immediately. "It's green, ittle, knotty," they cried. The one boy who vered that one rotten speck was very proud when I said: "Now since Lauris was so sharp as to discover the trouble, we'll have him tell us what will happen if we drop this apple into a basket of perfect fruit which is sitting in the cellar. Of course we'd leave it for a week."

He told us, and then I had him take his knife and halve the apple that we might see that, although it looked all right, it was bad at heart. Wasn't the lesson against keeping bad company more effective than if we had simply said: "You should not go with bad boys." They knew that. It must be proven.

When we had the lesson of the vine and the branches, I cut a forked bit of grapevine containing several buds, and questioned them. They liked to tell what kind of a vine it was, why it grew in sun and rain, how it finally produced grapes. Several looked blank when I said that, although we gave it sun and rain, it was slowly dying. One boy remembered that it had been cut from the root and could not receive nourishment.

Juniors' minds are active, and if not employed by the teacher will, though apparently attentive, be thinking of something which they heard yesterday or a week ago. Then we spoke of Jesus, with whom we must be in contact, or the branches—his children—will die; and we had a story of a man who, wishing for apples and knowing little of trees, purchased plum trees, and when they bore, scored the nurseryman roundly because he had sour plums instead of sweet apples. Even the boys knew better, and then we spoke of the fact that good men can not come from bad boys, unless the love of Jesus wipes away all the old habits and sins.

BOYS love adventure and bravery and daring. Washington and Lincoln, Daniel and David have each their interest and their disguised lesson, which must be imbibed unconsciously. There is no locality which has not its Prodigal Son. The story, brought down to date, will explain not only the mercy of the Heavenly Father, but show why some men are unsuccessful.

It is a lamentable fact that even in our best religious homes there is a shocking lack of knowledge as to Bible stories. Tell them! I have yet to see the child who will not be interested. I once asked, when visiting a class of Juniors, as to the author of the Ten Commandments. Not one knew, and the same class declared that Easter was for eating eggs. This was not in a slum district or an uneducated community. If you think this extreme, question a party of children as to the Bible heroes, whose lives were familiar to us in childhood, and see what you will get. And so, on this particular day, because I was grieved and surprised, I dispensed with the lesson and launched into the story of Jesus from Bethlehem to Calvary. I was surprised and pleased at the almost breathless interest of the children, who had attended Sunday school at intervals all their lives, had been raised by Christian parents, but who were unfamiliar with the simplest facts in the life of the Christ who died for them.

PERHAPS teachers are born and not made, and it is difficult to find those who will sacrifice and work and study and teach without compensation; but unless the right teacher is procured the child is driven away instead of drawn. Give them Bible history with all the gorgeous setting of golden palaces and marble floors and gold and purple hangings, and the trials which made David the shepherd boy, transferred to a palace, a king, and Daniel the prince, a prince though in a lion's den.

Give them stories of idol worship and people in heathen lands who are willing to die for their new religion. Give them adventure. The Bible contains enough to fill every lesson period for fifty-two Sundays, and then, if you can find no more, you may hold the boys speechless and interested for fifty-two Sundays more.

Select puzzle questions from each lesson in the quarter and drill each Sunday on those of the weeks preceding, until the twenty-four questions are as familiar as the alphabet; then let the superintendent question the class before the school. Oh, how delighted they will be in surpassing each other and showing the big folks what they know! This is not theory. I have tried it. In class, let them pass papers, take the offering, sing a solo or repeat a quotation suitable to the lesson. Promise occasionally a surprise for the following Sunday. They will be on tiptoe all week and on time the next Sunday, smiling and pleased, no matter how small it may be. The hunger for mystery has been gratified.

On special days, teach special things. For Fourth of July give bits of our country's history, lessons on good citizenship, how to make home and church better; pin to their coats tiny American flags; let them lead the school in singing "My Country, 'Tis of Thee."

YES, it takes work and planning and coin, but, oh, it pays! The Beginners and Primaries are always favored. The Juniors and Intermediates in many schools are neglected and finally when out from under the last of parental authority they drift out of the Sunday school to which they were driven instead of drawn, and we see them no more.

If the teacher is obliged to use threats and rough measures and severe discipline, it is her own fault. She has not made the lessons interesting. Only thirty or thirty-five minutes, with these dear ones! Oh, if you have a teacher in your school to whom you must drive your boy by threats instead of seeing him hurry smiling to his place, get rid of the teacher.

There is always a way to interest the fidgety boy. If the teacher can not do it, put your boy into the hands of some one who understands boys not only for the sake of the school, but for the boy who must be our future churchman.

"A RIGHT PROMISER"

By Elizabeth Palmer Milbank

A LITTLE friend and neighbor aged five years came in to see me the other day, shadows in his eyes and rosebud mouth drooping. I love the little chap for himself; I love him because for two years mother-love has been to him but a memory. So I welcomed him with a smile and a "What's the matter with you, Billy-boy?" But there was no answering smile, just a doleful:

"I got somefin' dreffel to tell you, Mrs. Mason."

Something too "dreffel" to be said aloud, evidently, for he climbed into my lap, put the drooping mouth close to my ear and whispered:

"Mrs. Mason, my papa isn't a right promiser."

The hopeless, despairing tone made the confession tragic.

"Why, Billy-boy, what do you mean?"

"He promised to bring me some candy and he didn't do it."

"Oh, but he is such a busy man, dear. He just forgot it."

"Yes," he answered soberly, "I thought about that. But he promised to make me a swing and he didn't do it."

I struggled to hold his faith.

"Billy, he probably didn't have the things ready to make a swing."

"Yes, I thought about that, too, but he promised to take me up town last night and he didn't do it, and," in a tone of sorrowful finality, "I know now he isn't a right promiser."

His voice broke on the last word and his blue eyes filled; but, too manly to shed tears, he whistled to his dog and hurried away before I could make further excuses for the father, who I also knew was "not a right promiser."

THE WORLD NEWS OF THE WEE

President Wilson Advises Labor

PRESIDENT WILSON has issued his counsel to labor. The Big Four Brotherhoods, through the representatives of the shop crafts, have been warned that no wage increases will be granted to railway employees. The President took into consideration threats of a general transportation strike, but after weighing all considerations carefully, and asking the advice of Director-General Hines, he informed a delegation of the shopworkers that their demands could not be granted. The President based his decision on the theory that as a basic industry, increases of wages to railway employees would mean a general increase in cost of living, which would react as much on the railway workers as on the public at large. The wage increase demands amount to approximately $800,000,000 a year, which would be added to the charge for virtually every necessity of life. The Workers' Committee went to the White House for its conference with the President, backed by a 98 per cent. vote by the shopworkers for a strike on September 2, and were very much surprised at the prompt rejection of their proposition. In announcing his decision, the President issued a statement to the public outlining his stand on wages and living costs, which provided a warning to all labor that it is now the policy of the government to discourage and to oppose all demands for further increases in wages until a survey of economic conditions has provided a basis for an accurate estimation of labor's needs. It is the opinion of the government that the cost of living now is showing decided signs of decreasing, and the President believes that if labor will be content for a very few months with what it has, conditions will reach a point where radical increases will not be necessary.

Aside from the White House interview, the most important development has been the refusal of the steel interests through Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation, and head of the steel interests, to meet representatives of labor. It has been a fixed policy of the steel interests to refuse recognition of labor unions. The unions now require this recognition and very important wage increases, on threat of a general strike, to which the American Federation of Labor and Samuel Gompers as president are committed. Mr. Gompers has just returned from attending conferences in Europe and has stepped at once into the fight.

The Fight on the Treaty

WITH the adoption by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations of definite amendments to the Peace Treaty, President Wilson has put into effect his long-delayed plan to carry his fight for Treaty ratification to the country. An itinerary has been prepared for a three weeks' trip which will carry him to the Pacific Coast, and which will involve some twenty-five set addresses in as many cities. Not until now has the issue been clear-cut. With no certainty that the Senate majority would insist on straight-out amendments or integral reservations, he hesitated to make a public appeal for support. The Foreign Relations Committee, however, has provided the ground for debate in adopting an amendment for the return of Shantung direct to China. In addition to this amendment, several others are under consideration, and there seems a certainty that they will have the support of the committee majority. Action is being hurried, and there is every probability that the entire treaty with its amendments, and reservations relating to Article X, the Monroe Doctrine, the Right of Withdrawal, and Internal Affairs, will be ready for submission to the Senate before the President leaves for his swing around the circle. Senator McCumber of North Dakota thus far is the only Republican who is showing a disposition to ride in the wagon with the President. Senators Knox, Borah, Johnson and Brandegee, all Republicans, and Reed, Democrat, will take the stump at about the time Mr. Wilson leaves Washington, and the next three weeks will see a situation very similar to the old-fashioned joint political debates. Observers in Washington now are busy counting noses, and unless conditions change materially before the Treaty comes to a vote, they see a majority of not more than one or two in favor of such amendments as the Foreign Relations Committee may submit. The Shantung Amendment may be said to be the key to the fight. If it carries the majority will just about have its own way. The principal argument advanced by Administration supporters for ratification without amendment or reservation is the necessity for re-submitting the Treaty to the Peace Conference, with the consequent result of having that fight all over again. Opponents of the Treaty, however, insist that the interests of this country should not be stultified solely to avoid complications in Paris.

Morris Reports on Kolchak

ROLAND S. MORRIS, American ambassador to Tokyo, who has been in Siberia for several weeks conducting an investigation of conditions there and in the Urals on instructions from President Wilson, has left Omsk for Japan and has sent several reports to the State Department urging the prompt recognition of the Kolchak government. Mr. Morris insists that had the United States granted recognition to Admiral Kolchak early in the mer when the question arose in the very serious reverses which Omsk government has met with w have been avoided. There is no tion of the seriousness of Kolch position. After a long and disast retreat, there seemed to be some of a recovery, aided by the activiti General Denekine in southeast Ru but the recovery was very slight. more Kolchak is withdrawing Denekine is finding it difficult t the gains he made early in August the aid of the Ukrainians, the latter succeeded in winning back Odessa probably Kieff, thus opening an ou to the Black Sea for a good par Southern Russia, but he has lost nection with the forces operating u Kolchak. The war materials which American Government has dispatc through Siberia to Omsk are not pected to reach there in time to b any great assistance to the hard-pre army. What Kolchak wants as m as arms is assurance of official, m and financial support, and that is w Mr. Morris asks the State Departm to grant. Failing this recognition, military party in Japan has laid plans to complete its domination Siberia; a domination for which groundwork has been prepared by presence of troups numbering at time more than 70,000 men. Just h strong this force is at present is pr lematical, but it is believed to num around 25,000 as against 8,000 Ame cans scattered along the Trans-Siber Railway.

in Paris as an incidental understanding growing out of the Peace Conference's discussions of Far Eastern affairs. The economic situation in China has long disturbed the Great Powers, and more than one effort has been made to bring about joint action to ease China's financial troubles. The Six-Power Group, just before the Great War began, was broken by President Wilson's refusal to permit American participation after all arrangements had been made by American bankers to take their share of the loan. Our appearance in world politics, however, brought about a change in the Wilson heart, and it was the American peace delegation which took the lead in the organization of the new Consortium, which had as its object the grouping of all China's international obligations and their refunding. What effect Japan's defection will have on the agreement is doubtful, but it seems certain the scheme for financing China will have to be abandoned unless diplomacy can effect a change of policy. Uchida made his announcement very much against his own inclination, and only after a hard struggle against the militarist party. This element is being gradually shorn of its power, and there is a probability that the liberal parties will be able to bring the country into line with the Allies.

The Plight of Armenia

WITHDRAWAL of British forces from the Caucasus was begun the third week in August, and simultaneously urgent appeals began to reach the United States from British representatives, American relief agents, and Armenians for the prompt dispatch of American troops to replace the British. The situation has grown more and more menacing for the new Armenian republic, and there are grave fears, supported by the presence of large bodies of Turks, Kurds and Tartars, that the disappearance of the present British police organization will mean the instant annihilation of the Armenian nation. So strong is this belief that Rear Admiral Mark L. Bristol, in command of the American naval forces at Constantinople, sent an informal warning to the Turkish Government calling attention to the danger of a general massacre. The Turks immediately complained to England and France that they were being threatened by the United States, and the result was quite a little flurry in Peace Conference circles in Paris. Considerable feeling developed there, and much resentment was expressed against the United States for interfering in Turkish affairs so long as there is any doubt about our taking a mandate over Armenia. It is very frankly stated in London newspapers that if the United States is not willing to accept the responsibility Christian Armenia will be left to its fate.

Crane and King to Report

CHARLES R. CRANE and Dr. Henry Churchill King, who went to Asia Minor in June as an American mission to investigate conditions in the Near East, returned to Paris August 27.

Mr. Crane and Dr. King visited thirty-nine cities of Asiatic Turkey and conferred with committees representing more than 1,200 villages. It was amazing, they say, to find how generally President Wilson's Fourteen Points were known throughout the Near East and how strong was the nationalistic feeling, even among the Arabs, who rode for days in order to meet the commission.

Unlike Russians, who returned from New York's East Side to Russia and bitterly denounced America, Mr. Crane says the Syrians who have returned from America have only praise for the United States and American ideals and ideas.

Asia Minor, according to Mr. Crane, is looking to America so hopefully that it would be a pity to disappoint the people of that territory by refusing to assist in bringing about order and peace there.

Knowing the Scriptures

International Sunday School Lesson for September 2

Ps. 19:7-14; 119:9-16; Acts 17:10-12; II Tim. 3:14-1

By Rev. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

THE Bible is the record of God's progressive revelation of his will. It came to us through the ancient people of Israel, to whom he had given a genius for religion above any other primitive race of mankind. Step by step, as their minds and hearts enlarged, he revealed himself more fully for the guidance of the world of the future. We read in Exodus 6:3, "I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac and unto Jacob, as God Almighty, but by my name Jehovah I was not known unto them." First, God Almighty, the supreme arbiter of the universe; then Jehovah, the Living One, the Great Cause and Upholder of his Covenant. Afterward the Holy One of Israel, as described by the prophets; then in the New Testament Our Father in Heaven, and "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ"—such is a brief transcript of the unfolding or development within the Scriptures of the knowledge of God. Well did the writer of Hebrews sum up the Scriptural story when he declared, "God, having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son." For Jesus Christ, our Saviour, is the climax of the revelation that has come to us in the Book of books.

This Sunday is a good day for a review of that perennially fascinating topic, "How we got our Bible,"—with perhaps a blackboard sketch of the wonderful story of its growth, its preservation through dark times, and its various translations. Each class should hear in detail some special incident, such as the work of William Tyndal to bring the Word to the people, and of his martyrdom no longer ago than 1536 for his love for the Bible in the common speech. How quickly was his dying prayer answered: "Lord, open the king of England's eyes!"

When we read incidents of sacrifice and effort in the past, such as Carey the cobbler learning Greek in order to be able to read the words of Jesus in the language of the New Testament, we feel rebuked at the all too frequent neglect of professed believers in the Bible now. What proportion of our young Timothys are becoming "good workmen, rightly dividing the Word of Truth?" Many could echo the sad confession of a soldier lad, writing home from the front: "I discovered here that I did not know how to use my New Testament at all." We all need periodical refreshment of mind even on the methods of Bible reading. We need to avail ourselves of the excellent aids so accessible today.

Not long ago, a lecturer fascinated large audiences of Christian people with his discourse on "How to Have a Growing Bible." His idea was excellent—that as you really master the Word, discover its teeming treasures, mark your copy and interleave it, too; it becomes more precious day by day. It really grows. What a tiny Bible some of us have—a few scraps remembered from the dear past! What a glorious heritage others enjoy—a vast, inexhaustible treasury of joy and light! There is a special value to your own copy of the Scriptures, one in which you find your way so readily, with the m of previous mountain-top revelat bringing its truths home to your experience within the soul. How m know what President Wilson thinks its importance? Yet it is referrred again and again in his published dresses. AS impressed with the appeal of . B. D., of Maryland, for informa- on the unity of churches, and hed by his plea, for his thoughts that he is impressed by Christ's ent prayer that all believers might ne. This prayer was answered for a , for in the first days of Christ's rch we find that "the multitudes em that believed were of one heart one soul" (Acts 4 : 32). This of affairs was before man had be- to impart his own ideas and rules lace of the perfect teaching and law n by Christ to the apostles for the blishment and government of his rch, which he said he would build, h he died for, and which he pur- ed with his own blood.

xhortations of the apostles were w I beseech you, brethren—that speak the same thing, and that be no divisions among you; but ye be perfectly joined together in same mind and in the same judg- t"—or opinion, according to the inal Greek (1 Cor. 1 : 10). "Be like- ded, having the same love, being of accord, of one mind" (Phil. 2 : 2). w God grant you to be like-minded toward another: that ye may with mind and one mouth glorify God" m. 15 : 5-6).

he people of the religious groups y are of different beliefs, con- ions, minds; and so are unable with mouth to glorify God. They are om heeding the above admonition; for they are trying to follow the teaching and commandments of men, who have compiled their varied and antagonistic creeds or beliefs and forms of government for the organizations of their own making. As long as this condition exists, it not only will be a huge task, but it will be impossible to bring the various branches of Protestantism together on common ground, to reduce the causes of rivalry, and to promote cooperation in Christian work. Man-made creeds and religious governments must be abolished first. There must be a complete return to God's Word, where we find given the conditions of salvation and the laws Christ has given for obedient believers to live by.

Christ is absolute monarch and lawgiver in his Kingdom, and mere man is not to presume to regulate his Kingdom by teaching ways of salvation of his own and his own rules for living.

By individuals studying God's Word and taking God's Word as the only authority on the way of salvation and guide for the believer's life, is the only way that believers can become one in faith, mind and speech to the glory of God. LEROY R. LEVIS.

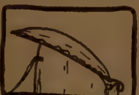
The Lamp-Shade that Carrie Made

By LAURA A. KIRKMAN

CARRIE'S auntie had trouble with her eyes and could not stand strong artificial light.

"I'll have to make you a small green shade to hook onto the globe of the living-room lamp," Carrie heard her mother say to her auntie. "In that way you can have shadow on one side of the lamp, and the rest of us can have a bright light on the other side."



Carrie said nothing, but she thought to herself that she could make that shade for auntie! So she secretly began to work upon it. This is how she made it:

She took some old hat wire and made an oval hoop with it, six inches in diameter. She then ran three separate pieces of wire through the center of the hoop, bowing them out slightly and gathering the ends together at the top and bottom of the oval. When this frame held together nicely (by having insecure parts bound firm with short pieces of wire), Carrie covered it with some green silk which she found in the rag-bag.

To give the shade a neat finish she edged it with braid. At the top she made a hook with a bent hairpin, so that the shade could be fastened to a lamp-shade (see illustration).

Carrie's work was so well done that mother said she would not have to make auntie the shade she had planned to, after all.

Three things become rusty and powerless—the unused tool, the unused mind, and the unresponsive heart.

COFFEE

plant-

This is the story of 200 years ago, as befell the gallant French marine—de Clieux. Charged by his King to carry a cargo of coffee plants to the Isle of Martinique, his good ship was be-calmed, be-stormed and be-devilled without end. Finally he was forced to share his last precious portion of drinking water with his one last drooping and dying plant. In such manner de Clieux preserved coffee for his King.

FROM this single plant, we are told, were produced the many varieties of coffee now grown in South America. So it happens,—millions of Americans are privileged to enjoy "the nation's most popular and healthful beverage."

Coffee is the most democratic of drinks. It appeals alike to rich and poor—to men and women. No home so humble it cannot afford coffee. No mansion so grand it can dispense with it. Everybody drinks coffee!

Who can describe the irresistible fragrance of a cup of hot steaming coffee? Its aroma, its "bouquet",—its deliciously delicate, rare, smooth, tempting piquancy? There is no other "taste" like that of good coffee.

And who shall say that coffee shall not become the social and convivial drink of the future? Men like it,—they drink it at breakfast,—at the business luncheon,—at the conference dinner—and at the club banquet.

Soon we shall have "coffee houses"—where men and women, too, may congregate and toast their friends in a cup of rare good coffee. And—it is well!

Coffee—the Universal drink

The Gospel Fisherman's Problem

By Rev. R. A. McCULLOH, Chattanooga, Tenn.

IS THE average minister of the Gospel doing his best possible work in his present location, with his present methods, as a "fisher of men"? Being a minister, I ask this question with all seriousness.

If Jesus should come to us, as he did to some of his disciples one day, and say "Children, have you any meat?" many would be forced to say, "Lord, we have toiled all night, and have taken nothing." And as with Peter, the Lord would probably say, "Cast your net on the other side, and you shall find"; and no doubt but that the same results would follow.

Are there other "holes" where the "fishermen" can catch more "fish"? Is it not true that, generally speaking, the present occupied pools (the churches, erected for public services) are just about "seined out"? When a division is made of the average congregation, is it not a well-known fact that the large majority are professed Christians? And is it not also true of a literal fisherman that he seeks the fish and casts his net or his hook where he finds them, or sets his net and drives them in? Of course it is a fact that fish are bred and fed in pools, sometimes, that are prepared for that purpose; and this may represent a part of the work of the Sunday schools, and of other set forms and places of the services of the Kingdom.

But when a recent lapse in the activities of the "keepers of the vineyard" is evident, shown by the fact that these by-pools of the Church contain so little of material to "work on," and when the present régime is proving sadly inadequate to the mighty demands of the work to be done (or not to be done), is it not time for the "fishermen" to cast their nets in a spot that is more abundantly populated with "fish"? Let the old place be "headquarters," but should we not fish where there are fish?

Why have the present places of worship failed to attract the populace during the past few decades? Some of my readers can remember when the churches, especially in country and village, were filled on Sundays and other times when the people came together; and they came with listening hearts, and thought on the minister's message during the days that followed.

One reason for the difference between then and now is this: at that time there were not so many periodicals for the people to read, and not so many who could have read them had they existed. They depended, therefore, upon the preacher for the greater part of their information. Being cut off from communication with the world at large and world interests, naturally they would think of the preacher's Gospel message, which to them was "good news from a far country." This "power of God" had a better chance to fashion the lives of the people then than the same message from the pulpit would have today.

WE NOW have a reading population. The great masses of people do not attend church, but they do read. They will unconsciously and unwittingly read the thoughts of unscrupulous writers; and with us all, more or less, diet is destiny. One imbibes the philosophy of the author whose pages he habitually reads.

I am now led to offer the following suggestions, which, it seems to me, if carried out, would be of great help in the wonderful work of making the world better.

First. In view of the fact that the masses are not found at church, but elsewhere, I would suggest that the ministry also be found elsewhere occasionally, with the Gospel message which is intended for the masses. It matters not where such a program would lead, whether on the street corner, in the shops, in the chapel halls of public schools, or anywhere and everywhere, wherever a hearing of the people may be secured. This plan is followed by promoters of political and monetary interests, and is not without results. Well did our Lord say, "The children of this world are in their generation wiser the children of light." But the n ters of the Gospel must be as detern to present their cause as are the moters of other causes, before they hope to succeed as well as they. I pastors of a city should reach su pinnacle of consecrated earnestness they would mutually agree to st themselves here and there where greatest number of people are seen days when the streets are flooded the multitudes, and preach the p simple Gospel message, surely suc act itself would create a profound pression upon the passers-by; and r of the seed sown on such a day w bring forth good fruit in many hu lives. Furthermore, it would l about an awakening which woul conducive to reverence for God's h and many of the empty seats woul filled at the public services. True, n of the ministers would have to put little of boldness, and put off a litt formality; but the effort and the s fice would find its fruition in brin the thronging multitudes into c touch with the Church, whose mi is to reach them with a message will lift them up into a better life.

THERE are rural communities within reach of the city mini where the Gospel is seldom if heard. It seems that the spirit of sions in the home land is slee There are exceptions, but the home f are by no means covered. The pe in these isolated neighborhoods are as needy and deserving as those w surroundings are more favorable. present missionary program of churches is unfair and partial. It dresses itself only to a special, lin number who find it rather convenie attend church at the regular serv The fact that we boast of our open d to every one who will come, and we are glad when they come, does make the present conditions other they are. We know that the g multitudinous masses of mankind not coming, and not regarding our gent invitations to come. The chur are not expecting them to come. evidence of this is the lack of prep tion to receive them if they should c the present capacity of all the chur is wholly inadequate to accommo them. So it is: the present prog and vision coincide easily.

Secondly. In view of the fact we have a reading populace, I w suggest that a more extensive effor made on the part of the ministry to ize the power of paper with the pri page. In this way a message w reach the old, the sick, the poor, an who cannot, as well as those who not, attend public worship. The erman's hook must be "baited" something palatable, and placed channels where the fish are found. people are in the channels of read They are literally devouring v periodicals. If they read a message touches the God-given longing of soul, they may be caught and brou into the Kingdom.

Every minister should send a wri message, if only a card or a letter regular intervals, to his parishion and to others who are not being reac by others. These messages will enc age and brighten the home, and do n of real good than one may expect know.

Now that the present program of large majority of the churches in country is not fulfilling its intended pose in reaching a lost world for Ch that the mighty masses of the wo population are as "sheep without a s herd"; and that they are gathering formation, forming ideals, and buil characters for which the printed pa are largely responsible: therefore it hooves the Christian leadership of land to enter these respective fields the message of Him who, when he the hungry, thronging masses of hu souls, said, "I have compassion on multitude."

ricans in Silesia. Much oppo- has arisen in Washington to the al to send American troops into Silesia for police work. The trouble, which has become acute between the Germans and Poles, has resulted in the shut-down of all mines and railways and in a state of civil war and general demoralization, and the Peace Conference has suggested that a contingent of Americans be sent in to maintain order and permit the operation of coal properties. The opposition has reached a point where resolutions have been introduced in the House forbidding the use of American soldiers for the purpose.

FOREIGN

Britain Stops Warship Work. The British Admiralty has ordered work stopped on all war vessels on the Clyde except those which are about to be launched.

Serbia and Rumania Quarrel. The Rumanian Cabinet has refused to accept the Peace Conference decision in regard to the Banat and both Serbia and Rumania are concentrating troops in the Danube region. In the disposition of the Banat Serbia got much the greater portion over Rumanian protests, and efforts on the part of the Allied powers to smooth over the quarrel have been fruitless. Bucharest has just filed formal notice that the decision of the conference is not satisfactory.

Archduke Joseph Out. The advice by Herbert C. Hoover to the Supreme Council, that any peace in Central Europe was impossible so long as Archduke Joseph remained in power in Budapest, was promptly acted on and the scion of the Hapsburgs was given two hours to resign his post as chief of the Hungarian government. Before the end of the two hours Joseph had relinquished his powers to Premier Friederich, who is undertaking now to form a new ministry. He is having some difficulty in accomplishing this, however, because of a suspicion that he is still under the influence of the Archduke and because the Socialists are refusing to deal with him. The Peace Conference apparently has decided to let the Rumanian occupation of Hungary take its course, but another warning has been sent to the Rumanian government that it will be compelled to pay for all food and materials taken from the country.

New Passenger Zeppelin. In spite of all Germany's troubles, the development of airships is proceeding and a new Zeppelin passenger carrier has just made its first trip from Lake Constance to Berlin and back. The craft carried twenty-one passengers in addition to its crew and made the outbound passage of 435 miles in a little more than six hours.

Novel Tax for Germans. In the German government's search for opportunities for further taxation, a suggestion has been made that a levy of 20 marks be made against every man who escaped active service during the war. The government estimates the return would be about 120,000,000 marks.

Aviators to Aid Poles. An American aviation squadron along the lines of the Lafayette Escadrille is being organized in Paris to take service with the Polish army which is fighting Bolshevism. Already the squadron has enlisted half a dozen famous American aviators, who are leaving Paris for Warsaw about September 15.

The Scheldt River Dispute, Belgium's demand for Dutch territory on the left bank of the Scheldt, or failing that, the internationalization of the river, has come acutely before the Peace Conference with the protest of Holland against the transfer of any Dutch interests. Feeling is running quite high along the border and Holland is accusing the Belgian government of sending agents across the frontier for the purpose of influencing the attitude of Dutch citizens along the border in favor of Belgian demands. The Peace Conference sub-commission is now studying the subject.

Club for colored soldiers, Louisville, Kentucky

Open House to the Colored Troo

ONE of the most interesting and at the same time most complex problems which the War Camp Community Service met in the camp cities dotted over the United States was that of the colored troops. Temperamentally so different from the white soldiers and sailors, but wearing the same uniform and offering the same spirit of sacrifice and service to the country, the colored men needed hospitality and entertainment of a unique sort provided for them.

It was discovered early in the career of War Camp Community Service that where white troops wanted many parties and dances, the colored troops wanted religious meetings and "sings" interspersed with the parties. When the armistice was signed the War Camp organization was guiding in forty-six communities activities for colored men and in thirty of these there were colored clubs. In every one of these centers where the colored men have special activities, music plays a leading rôle.

Never had the power of song over this musical, music-loving race been so evident as in these war days, when the colored youth of the entire country was mobilized, and their social needs more centralized than ever before. After an evening of singing "Keep the Home Fires Burning," "The South W
Her Part," and other Liberty finishing up with spirituals s
"Deep River" and "Swing Low, Chariot," in a Community Hou colored men went back to ca freshed in spirit and renewed i for their training work.

But important as the enterta work was, it was far from the su of service given the colored men War Camp organization. The day program of a community d included making provision for the sick, finding husbands and France and in camps, putting dents into touch with the all bureaus, writing letters for the and maintaining special colored mation booths and colored Tra Aid.

There is a growing appreciat over America of the service colored troops, and with appre comes more understanding of peculiar needs. Everywhere no the colored residents of the citi

with the War Camp Communit

How All the Animals Bathe

ALL the animals, no matter whether they live wild in the forests or are tame as the cats that you have in your own home, wash themselves very regularly so that they may keep clean. Some of them like to get into the water, other animals give themselves a shower bath, while still others wash themselves by licking their fur and combing it dry with their paws. All the cat family, that means the cat that lives in the house and his cousins the lions, leopards and tigers, use this method—and while they keep themselves very clean they never get into the water.

Bears, however, are like dogs. They like to get in the water on a warm day and splash around until they feel nice and clean. Then they find a grassy field near the river and have a roll so as to dry their fur. The elephant is the animal that likes the shower bath. He walks into the water, and after he has stood there for some time he fills his trunk with water and sprinkles himself all over. Monkeys, when they live in the forests, are quite clean, and explorers report that they have often seen big monkeys dashing the water into their faces, as humans do.

The hog, like his cousin the pig that lives in the farmer's barnyard, has often been called a dirty animal. This is not right, for if there is a river near by a wild hog will bathe, and then rub himself dry against a tree trunk.

A great many animals comb their coats every day. Nearly all the small animals, like moles and hedgeho

Squirrels clean and sharpen their

were rubbing their hands togethe

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

AMONG the numerous letters to the Prayer League received during the last week are many that are of special interest. A Mother in Staunton, Va., writes broken-heartedly asking prayers for her boy who is in the army and has been given a prison sentence, as she believes unjustly. Another Mother in New Richmond, Ohio, asks for prayers that the state legislature may pass the old-age pension act for the sake of the old people who need such help.

A lady in Detroit writes: "Just a month ago I sent two requests for prayer for two young married men. One had been separated from his wife and baby through the interference of relatives. In the second case the young household was threatened with having their home sold over their heads. Both prayers have been abundantly answered. In the first case a reconciliation has been effected, and in the other an amicable agreement satisfactorily to all concerned has been reached." She gives God the glory for these blessings.

Rev. G. T., Elmhurst, Ill., reports to the Prayer League a quickened spiritual interest and the addition of more than fifty to the church in answer to prayer.

Missionary E. L. L., Chitre, Panama, asks prayer for the Faith Gospel Mission which is holding up the light of Christ among the Spanish-speaking people of Panama. The mission has a few loyal members and many more interested. Prayer is asked that the Holy Spirit may bless its work in every way.

Prayer is asked by L. D., Los Angeles, Calif., for hungry souls in prison who are finding God through messages in religious papers. He writes that the Christian Herald, which has been sent to many of the prisoners, is doing much good.

Several friends ask prayer that their husbands may accept Christ and that their homes may be made fully Christian. One mother asks prayer also for her child, eighteen months old, that it may become normal in every way. Another asks that an unfaithful husband who has shown some signs of remorse may give his affection entirely to her and his two little girls and turn his life completely from the sins which have destroyed the happiness of their home, sincerely acknowledging Christ, whom he once pretended to serve. Another mother asks prayer for the conversion of her husband because of his great influence on her little boy, who imitates every action of his father.

D. S. H., 76 years old, the only ordained minister in a Western county, asks prayer that he may be given strength to reach every family in the county.

J. R. D. asks prayer that her boy, whose nervous system broke down under the strain of the army service, may be restored.

A Friend in Pennsylvania asks prayer that a group of neighbors who covet her farm and prevent her from making a proper lease to a coal company may be circumvented.

Miss E. L. asks prayer that she may become a Christian and be able to do some good before she dies. She feels it is terrible to be without Christ, and she has said so many awful things about Christ that she is afraid he will cast her off. She should forget her sins and remember only that God said, "Whosoever will."

A friend who encloses $1 for Mont-Lawn asks prayer that her son may be healed of epileptic fits.

Alice D. B. asks prayer that her husband may give his heart fully to Christ and that he may cease the raillery with which he greets her own devotion. She says: "I have had wonderful blessings from my God and have had prevailing power in prayer both before and since my marriage and in some very serious problems of my home. And others have told me that I have helped them, both with my prayers and my speech. But this trouble with my husband seems to unfit me for the duties of daily living or the privileges of working for God. It has nearly wrecked my health.

"I dearly love my husband and I do not believe in divorce. I believe that in every experience in life there is a lesson for the Christian, if he will search deep enough for it, and if he will accept it. But I have reached the place where my prayers do not seem to reach through the gathering forces of evil.

"The crisis came a few days ago. I seemed to feel a cog slipping in my brain. I felt that if I gave way to extreme emotion I was gone, and that if I lost my reason Satan had me. If I could not witness for Christ right at that time and place my chance for further witness would be gone. Just as I felt myself slipping over the brink, struggling to hold on but slipping, slipping, these words came to me: 'My strength is sufficient for thee'—and the crisis was past. I was ill for days. And I found that in endeavoring to keep control of myself I had thrust my arm into my mouth and bitten it in two places.

"I remember Christ Jesus' promise, 'Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them'; and that other—'If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven.' I khow God does not want me to be unfitted for Christian work. I know he wants peace and harmony to dwell in my home. I know that he wants it to be a Christian home.

"Knowing that my wish is in harmony with God's will, I ask the Christian Herald Prayer League to join their prayers with mine that Jesus will cast out the evil spirits who are contending for control of this home and forbid them to come back again, that the Holy Spirit will take possession of my husband's life and of my life—and so fill us and use us that we may lead the unbelieving members of our household to accept Jesus."

Question

Margaret E. Sangster

I wonder why my mother throws
The very nicest things away?
Why, I should think she'd like to play
With such nice things. I told her so,
But all she did was laugh and say,
"They clutter up my bureau drawer,
"And I don't want them anymore!"
My mother laughed! And, yet, to-day,
I found a fan—just torn a bit—
And lace, with just two holes in it....
I'm 'fraid my mother's wasteful, for
She throws the nicest things away!

PERSONAL TO YOU

We would call the attention of every reader to the announcement of the Christian Herald Bible Course, which appears on another page of this issue. We present this proposition with confidence that it will be welcomed by thousands of our friends who will now have the long-wished-for opportunity of taking up the study of God's Word, under the direction of the best teachers in America. Dr. Gray and four of his associates in the Moody Bible Institute, of which he is himself the Dean, constitute the teaching faculty. They represent different denominations, but all are at one on the fundamentals and have long experience in Bible teaching, having instructed thousands of men and women in the past. The Course itself, as the announcement explains, is one that can be easily comprehended and mastered. Every student will have full instructions and will be in touch at regular periods with the teaching corps of teachers, by mail. We regard it as of vital importance that all should appreciate the value of this opportunity at a time when the knowledge of the Bible is all too limited, when it should be the standard spiritual guide-book of this nation.

This is a matter for a quick decision, and we would urge all to read the announcement thoroughly and then to join the Course. Do not permit the opportunity to pass, but decide at once. It is a step which, having once taken, you will never regret.

Billy Sunday at Ocean Grove

CONSECRATED fifty years ago to religious uses, the Camp Meeting Ground at Ocean Grove, N. J., has become a settled community which is perhaps different from any other in the country. Originally laid out for a tent camp, governed by a Camp Meeting Association, a city of 30,000 people has grown up, of which the great Auditorium of the Camp Meeting Ground is a center, the whole community being bound together by religious interest and governed by the Camp Meeting Association as nearly as may be for the glory of God.

In the summer time those who seek Ocean Grove for spiritual and physical rest and recreation increase its population to 100,000, and although some come without much thought of the spiritual, few leave without recognizing its force. On every day in the summer, three meetings are held at 9 A.M.—a meeting for boys and girls in Thornley Chapel, a meeting for young people in the Temple, and an evangelistic meeting in the Tabernacle; and at 6.30 P.M. a twilight meeting is held in the Tabernacle. On Sunday these gatherings are increased by two services of worship in the Auditorium; by a beach meeting at the foot of Ocean Pathway at 6 P.M.; by meetings in the North and South End Pavilions at 4 P.M., and by a great Bible class in the Auditorium, and Sunday school sessions in the Tabernacle and Temple at 2.30 P.M. Every day throughout the summer these meetings are thronged, and thousands carry away from Ocean Grove spiritual power which marks their church life throughout the rest of the year. Spiritual results have been especially marked at these services during the present summer. Souls have been saved and Christians have been sanctified and rededicated in increasing numbers.

Ocean Grove observes Sunday. There is no bathing; there is no secular amusement within the camp meeting grounds. The gates at the entrances are closed. Automobile horns are silenced and the footfalls of horses are unheard on that day. Every activity is centered in the buildings dedicated to the worship of God and to the preparation of men and women for his service.

The Sunday Bible Class, under Dr. L. W. Munhall, has touched the thousand mark in attendance for the first time in several years. This year Ocean Grove, celebrating the semi-centenary of its existence, made it a jubilee year. Although successful in every spiritual sense, the Association has gradually gone deeper into debt as the years have sped, the total indebtedness now being $700,000. It was hoped to raise one-seventh of this during the present season, and the intention is to clear it entirely away as fast as money can be raised, in order that the money now being paid in interest may be turned over to the spiritual development of the Camp Meeting.

THE season this year was brought to a fitting climax under the leadership of Evangelist William A. Sunday, who preached for the first time Saturday morning, August 23, following with two sermons a day until August 31. On Friday evening before Mr. Sunday's first sermon a consecration service in the Auditorium brought 1,500 people together to partake of the sacrament and dedicate themselves to the service of Christ. The Auditorium was nearly filled Saturday morning and was packed on Saturday evening and at the two Sunday services following. Mr. Sunday traveled across the continent from California to be present at this series of meetings.

In a conversation with the writer before his services, Mr. Sunday told of his great love for the Christian Herald. He said that in his opinion "the Ch tian Herald is the best religious pa for the American home."

Turning to Dr. Munhall, who next to him, after he had received enthusiastic welcome of the people, just before beginning his sermon, Sunday said he felt nervous. He he always felt nervous before a series meetings or before a sermon, and he hoped he would never get over it. kept him hanging on to God and tru ing his power for success.

Nobody would have known that Sunday had been nervous, two seco after he began his sermon. He Ocean Grove how glad he was to there, and the applause indicated the people shared his feeling. preached his first sermon from the "The Hour is Come." It was a for the individual Christian to fit self for active Christian service, es cially for personal evangelism, and appeal to the Church to recognize embrace the great opportunity sented it by present conditions for preaching of its Gospel throughout world.

Mr. Sunday was happy in his w and throughout the week the g audiences hung upon his words, m ing his sallies against the devil, hypocrite, the backslider, the self-sa fied church member and the unrepe ant sinner with that ready appreciat which marks both understanding agreement. On August 24, under impetus of Mr. Sunday's personal the campaign for subscriptions to the debt was carried from $17,000 total of $52,000.

FOLLOWING the August 31 m ing, plans for the Camp Mee included a week of services under leadership of Gipsy Smith, the known evangelist, and on Labor the Camp Meeting proper, closed the annual "Walk Around Jerusale On September 14 a great tempera rally was scheduled to celebrate death and burial of John Barley and the dawn of a new day.

The Southern Kurdistan Rising

The chiefs of a nomad tribe in Southern Kurdistan who spend the winter in the plains and retire in the summer to the cool mountain fastness of Kurdistan. The rising in South Kurdistan is headed by a local sheikh, and it is feared that British officers and troops have been taken prisoners. The gendarmarie has been defeated, and wires have been cut in several places. The Mesopotamian army of occupation is taking steps to overthrow the tribesmen by a display of force.

Increasing Church Attendance

ATTENDANCE at churches of New York is above that of war years. The Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church reports numbers in its pews 40 per cent. greater than last year and the year before, barring the appearance in its pulpit of popular favorites. St. Thomas's Episcopal Church has 25 per cent. more. St. Bartholomew's, Park Avenue, which filled its church in war summers by getting famous English preachers, does the same this year with its assistant minister.

Attendance at Protestant churches of the West Side, Fifty-seventh Street north to Harlem, is back to pre-war numbers, yesterday's attendance being 15 per cent. above August Sundays of last year. Harlem churches show the same changes, and so do Brooklyn. These records are taken from those kept by church authorities and from amounts of money given in plate collections, which in many churches will amount, it is known, to twice those of August of last year.

The showing is regarded as all the more significant in view of the fact that, with some exceptions, no famous preachers of the country or England are here this year. The Marble Collegiate Church, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street, for example, has had its assistant minister as preacher and filled its pews the entire summer. Christian leaders look upon the change as significant, and are planning larger work because of it.

The Rights of the Indians

A Plea for Help to Christian People by the United Tribes of British Columbia

NCE the war started in 1914 three thousand five hundred Indians have enlisted in Canada to strengthen hands of our king, in spite of all ill treatment we have received in s past from our agent. This great was fought to defend a small nation. the Tsimshean people, are a small n. Why cannot we have the pro- on of law? Our land has been n from us by the whites without pensation; not only the land, but two rivers which supported our athers long before the whites came. e are many town sites built on it, ng rights and timber rights and r rights, farming and fruit lands. the land and every thing on it is vested in our hands. Our lands never been ceded or purchased by government under the king; there- according to the king's law they are still. Why is it that the proclama- of King George III in the year 1763 not cover British Columbia as well he rest of Canada? The Indian and rights were fully recognized by legislature of Vancouver Island, as m by the petition of the House of mbly of Vancouver Island, referred n the sessional papers of British mbia in 1876, page 179, and in to the said petition the Right orable Secretary of State for the nies in his despatch from Downing et, dated 19th October, 1861, says: m fully sensible of the great importance of purchasing without loss of time the native title to the soil of Vancouver Island." This Indian title was referred to in the address of Lord Dufferin, Governor General of Canada, to the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia made on the 20th day of September, 1876: "From my first arrival in Canada I have been very much preoccupied with the condition of the Indian population of this province. . . . Before we touch an acre we must make a treaty with the chiefs representing the lands we are dealing with," and having agreed upon paid our stipulated price. This side of 1876 every record was carefully examined and no scrap of paper found which indicated that our forefathers had been compensated for their land. We have been sending petition after petition, but we have received no answer up to this present time. In 1882 the discussion of the land question commenced at Metlakatla, B. C. In the year 1886 a party of government surveyors were prevented from surveying the ten-mile square for a Metlakatla reserve by the people of Metlakatla, near the present town of Prince Rupert. This shows plainly that our fathers did not agree to live upon the land known as a reservation.

So in the latter part of the summer of 1887 the eight hundred people from Metlakatla, B. C., moved over to Port Chester on Annetta Island, Alaska, 80 miles north from Metlakatla, and we the people remain firmly on our forefathers' land unto this present day. A few years ago we were excluded from fishing in our own rivers. We are not allowed to sell part of our own land. We are not allowed to fish without buying license, nor to cut our own timber and sell it to any lumber factory. Now we are still in the slave condition.

Now we present our question between us and the government of the province. Who has a right to claim the land? The natives or the provincial government? If some one says the government, we ask, on what ground could the province assert its claim to ownership, unless the same shall have been first purchased from our foreathers?

Many of our young men have taken part in this great war and most of them shed their blood on the soil of Europe. The government of Canada mentioned the settling of returned soldiers on farms. and the Dominion taking Indian land for it. Is that the way to pay the Indians as a people for what they have given in life in this great war?

All the best drugs which helped our people from getting epidemic diseases are taken away from the native stores. And now we as a people face nothing but death.

From the president of the United Tribes of British Columbia.

Children of the Serbian Hills

'HOUGHT I had found the worst of Serbia's need when I traveled ugh the north and saw the suffering ie children there. But now I have the south, and the hills of the h, and the children of the hills— the misery passes description.

ere one finds village after village re there are literally no men left ll—those who were not killed in le were murdered or deported by Bulgars. Not only are the men l, but the houses are all burned.

hen the enemy came and the sacres began, as many women as d escape fled into the forests and ntains with their children, and l like wild things till the Terror passed on. Then, little by little, crept down again to the lower where their villages had been. y cut down trees and branches and e shelters. They cannot possibly alled houses; they are rude sheds two sloping walls meeting at the and thatched to keep out the In such dens they have lived for e and a half years—often two whole lies huddled together in one shelter.

e are frequently asked if the Serbian rnment cannot take care of its orphans. Under normal conditions rphan in Serbia can find a home an uncle or aunt, as any farm- e can always shelter one more. the farmhouses have been burned, farm lands laid waste, orchards, vineyards and meadows destroyed, the farming implements have been shipped out of the country and the cattle are gone; one-half of the tax-paying citizens are dead.

A Serbian mother and child

The Minister of Child Welfare, one of the most energetic men in Serbia, has made a careful survey of the situation and knows just what needs to be done for the 500,000 destitute children. The government has suffered with its people, and there is neither money nor organization adequate for the emergency.

The Serbian Relief Committee of America is sending a commission of nineteen physicians and nurses under Major Wm. H. Cressy, M.D. These workers will form local units for the relief of southern Serbia. Another medical commission will be sent as soon as possible. The first great and imperative need is for medical treatment.

It is following the policy of home relief. A mother is paid a small stipend to supplement her earnings, thus enabling her to keep her children together. We are reluctant to introduce into Serbia the American institution known as the orphanage. However, we have found it necessary to establish three temporary homes for children who have absolutely no shelter of any kind. With the restoration of Serbian farm life it is hoped that homes will be found for all of the 70,000 fatherless, motherless waifs. The Serbian Relief Committee of America has undertaken to raise three million dollars for its share of the work this year.

e Drug Trade in China

RTHER evidence that morphine, opium and cocaine in large quan- s are being conveyed into China Japan has been received in a let- rom Rev. Dr. Patterson, one of the ng missionaries in Central China, addressed to Dr. Hervey E. Wood, tary of the Anti-Liquor Traffic mittee. Dr. Patterson writes that teen tons of these drugs have been into China this year. He also s that there are eight Japanese stores in Chefoo, selling two-pound ages of opium with a small pack- of cocaine enclosed, the outside age being labeled "Worm Loz- " It appears from the letter that s are being erected in China where Japanese are sending opium and ine as military stores through Man- ia, and that bundles of these deadly drugs are being smuggled into China through the mails, or carried upon the person from Korea. In two hours twenty-five morphine users were met in the heart of the city of Chefoo. They were found huddled in a low room, perfectly helpless, and the odor of the place was said to be sickening.

Striking Bolshevism

THE Moody Bible Institute, in cooperation with one of the largest religious organizations in the Middle West, is about to introduce a Russian course in its curriculum, designed to afford those who have accepted the Christian faith an opportunity to prepare themselves, free of charge, for Christian work among their own people. The proposed course will cover from two to three years, and offers a thorough training in Elementary and Secondary English, Bible Study and Gospel Music. The education of young Russians in America is a subject of interest to every Christian patriot. There are 30,000 Russians in Chicago alone. Fewer than 100 of these are known to have become Christians. Other cities and industrial centers hold large numbers of them. These thousands of Russians may be a power for good here and in their own land, or they may become an increasing menace to us. Through them Bolshevism is being disseminated, and many of the same causes of unrest and disorder prevailing in Russia are working in our country today. If the trend toward anarchy and infidelity is to be checked, and their antagonistic attitude toward law and order changed, definite efforts are called for. Such Christian educational centers as the Moody Bible Institute can help to meet this need.

Wild Birds as Missionary Messenger

DOWN in Essex County, Ontario, the southernmost part of Canada, bordering upon the shore of Lake Erie, there lives a man to whom are attracted thousands of wild geese, ducks and other helpless creatures of the air every spring and fall in their transcontinental migratory flight. The heart of this man is so free from guile and deception that these wild creatures have learned to recognize the safety of the acreage surrounding his home. Proudly they stop, en route from the winter climes of the Southland to the summer climes of the Northland, for a short sojourn with Jack Miner, bringing with them not only their own little flock of young, but their neighbors and friends of the winter time. Should a hunter's aim strike one of these helpless creatures in their flight, they continue on and on, with unremitting effort, until Jack Miner's sanctuary is reached, feebly dropping at his feet, and certain of his aid and kindly ministration.

It is told that one of these wild geese a few seasons ago, cruelly shattered by a hunter's aim, feeble of wing and sore of body, reached the feet of the benefactor of her kind—and died!

Another brave little creature of the air, maimed and bleeding, with a portion of one leg torn away by a shot of powder, with strenuous effort flew to Jack Miner's feet one day. Its bruised and bleeding limb was placed in splints, and the weakened creature cared for until restored to activity. However, maimed and crippled, it later flew away to join its comrades in their flight. This occurred five years ago, and for three consecutive seasons this crippled bird returned to the Miner sanctuary; when lo, two years ago, her comrades flew away without her, and she remained behind at the feet of the man who has saved her life. She hobbles after him wherever he goes, with pathetic gratitude.

Jack Miner not only shelters these wild creatures of the wing and understands them, but he uses them as carriers of the Gospel of God—"missionary messengers" he calls them, for often they pierce into territory with their message of love, as yet untouched by the human messenger!

Since the year 1915 Mr. Miner has established a systematic tagging system. During the period of their sojourn upon his farm these birds are tagged, i.e., their legs are banded with little aluminum tags bearing the request that the person catching or killing a bird carrying such a band, kindly return the band to Mr. Miner, for which service he pays one dollar for each tag returned. More than five hundred wild geese and ducks have been tagged, and recorded in this manner, and approximately 150 tags have been returned to him.

Of late years this idealistic naturalist, whose faith in all things good is wondrous great, conceived the idea that these birds might spread the Gospel of God, thus creating of them what he terms "missionary messengers," and now each band placed upon the leg entered his book-decorated study and wrote his resignation and applied for three vacancies listed in his denominational paper. Oh, yes, there were vacancies enough. He knew far better than his good deacon how quickly he could find a "place." But how he dreaded to tell the woman whose presence in the house was proclaimed by the closing of an oven door!

"I only hope the next kitchen will be as lovable as this," said Eunice Clark in an even tone that proved she had not been taken wholly by surprise by her husband's words. "Emery, you are sixty-one years old today, but the greatest general in the world is sixty-six. I wonder if you could pocket your family and ministerial pride and learn so many things from the farmers here before we leave that when you reach your next field you may be able to think intelligently, at least. You have taken more interest in burial services than in weddings for the last ten years—because you have heard so much about the dead line of ministers, I suppose. Emery"—and the speaker disappeared into the dining-room—"Emery, how old are you now?" she called from the doorway a moment later.

"Just ten!" cried Emery Clark, answering the twinkling candles that illumined his birthday cake with a smile that made his face beautiful to the woman beside him. "Oh, Eunice, you never forget!"

The next Sunday the Rev. Emery Clark read his resignation amended to take effect two weeks before the arrival of his successor, and on Monday morning he presented himself in the field, where he observed Daniel Holway busily at work.

"What is blight, please!" he asked.

A Practical View of Church Division

I HAVE been so much interested in the various articles recently published by you concerning the churches, Church Unity, the new work of the Church, etc, that I have been tempted to add my mite.

I am in touch with many, very many country and village churches that are in a greater or lesser stage of decadence. After considerable study and observation, I have about made up my mind that this deplorable condition has been largely brought about by the different denominations adhering to their creeds, rituals, etc., and failing to minister to the communities in which they are placed. In one village of 264 inhabitants there are four churches (one of them closed lately), and the village is divided into just that many factions. There is no resident pastor, no spiritual leader, and the young people are mostly growing up outside the Church. More time is spent here in fighting among the denominations than in fighting the powers of evil.

Another case: a small town in this state has two churches of different denominations; two good buildings, but neither congregation is able alone to support a pastor. Neither church will consent to have a minister of the other's faith, so a minister of neither faith is employed, and services are held in each church on alternate Sundays. One good church here could support a pastor full time, and, greatest of all, do what now in their divided condition they are not doing—"feed the lambs" of the flock; for the young people are not in the Church.

I know another place where, within a radius of three or four miles, there are seven churches and no resident pastor.

Some time ago some one told me the following story. Whether true or

In all plants and offices of the American Chain Company, Inc., is posted the placard reproduced above. The placards were sent to the plant and office managers with the following letter:

The spirit, the feeling of a people, their single-hearted devotion to a purpose is sometimes expressed in a single simple phrase that is a guide and an inspiration.

To some of the hundreds of ACCO Boys who served in France it occurred that, in their daily work at home, there was something of the spirit of feeling of the Poilus at Verdun—the giving the best one has to protect the life and safety of others.

Each of us in the ACCO Family no matter what the work may be, does give his or her best in a spirit of unity and co-operation.

We are welded together in a common purpose as each link is welded in a chain.

Wherever they are used, we members of the ACCO Family see our chains doing their appointed task on land and sea.

Each of us, whether he or she works with hands or head, realizes a personal responsibility.

We know the safety of thousands upon thousands depends upon our devotion to our work. Their confidence in us, their dependence upon us, creates a trust we cannot escape.

A spirit such as this always finds expression as it has in our organization. Once it is formulated it is recognized as a real thing and true.

Therefore we know that all the members of the ACCO Family will be glad to see before our eyes that which is at once our commandment and our creed: "THEY SHALL NOT BREAK!"

ACCO Chains are made by experts—from the ore to the finished product, and not a single chain ever leaves our factories until our rigid tests show EVERY LINK in every CHAIN to be absolutely safe. The big ACCO line includes chains for every purpose —from plumbers' safety chain to ships' anchor chain—all sizes, styles and finishes.

N CAMEL-BACK TO PHARAOH'S CASTLE”

a's Rockhewn Palaces in the Sinai Desert as They Are Today—A Startling Way of Securing Relics

By an Occasional Correspondent

OF ALL the historical places, Petra is the hardest to reach. It lies in the barren desert, down in the corner of the Sinaitic peninsula, amid ignorant and wild Arab tribes.

was my privilege to be appointed in Maan in as an officer attached to the third battalion of portation. Maan is a small village some thirty tes from the station of that name on the Hedjaz way which runs from Damascus to Medina. It e only green spot in that barren district of flinty es and burning heat.

om Maan I was sent to a small place called h, in charge of the sick and weak camels, because h had pasture. So we went, some 500 camels and nen, the journey taking four hours. We found no ses, but an old fortress and a very cold, refreshing am, on the edges of which a few herbs sprouted and there. For a time the camels seemed to efit by the change; but when, they had eaten all herbs, they turned to the stones, which they ate grass. Two of the camels died, and when we dis- ed them we found to our amazement that in their perate hunger they had swallowed the stones.

ne day my Arab guide informed me that famous tomb of Aaron and those of the ans were very near to us. I decided to visit place. I happened at the time to receive a guest a Christian officer from Jerusalem, o agreed to accompany me. We chose our jins (dromedaries), put on our best uni- ms, and wore our dust eye-glasses to impress Arabs. I once heard an Arab ask one of soldiers why I wore the glasses. “Does he ve another pair of eyes?” he asked. We k along with us, besides our Bedouin guide, o soldiers to wait on us, and two armed men a guard. We had not gone an hour when we me within an Arab camp, that of the Fara- la tribe. They ran out to meet us and gave welcome. We were soon seated on rugs, and e sheik came and inquired whether he could of any service to “the sons of the great Kha- a.” Before we left their camp, they insisted at we partake of food with them. It is a bad nen, they hold, if a guest comes in and goes it without this friendly ceremonial. So we waited until they prepared for us some fried eggs, sour milk and coffee.

The Bedouin men seemed to lead a very lazy life, doing nothing but smoking and sleeping all the day and night. The women did all the business, both in the tent and outside. They had to milk the goats, get the milk and the butter out, and fetch the water. In the whole camp there were about thirty black tents. In the center was the sheikh's tent, the largest and best. Here all visitors are received and the men gathered during the day to discuss the affairs of the tribe. The tent had nothing of furniture, save a rug or two, worked from the hair of the goats by the women, and some very dirty bedding. Scarcely any kitchen utensils were visible. Coffee is served in one or two cups, pouring few drops at a time. One cup goes round from one person to another, and when every one has supped they pass the cup around again until the coffee is finished.

We spent in the camp about an hour and a half and then resumed our journey. The heat had begun to be felt more intensely. Perspiration flowed from the brows of the soldiers who were afoot. At last we caught a glimpse of the hills which our guide told us sheltered the remains of Petra. We descended the valley at a quick pace. We came to a flowing stream. Here the Bedouin said: “This is the place where Moses struck the rock and the water gushed out.” We stopped beside the stream and went into a nearby cave and rested. It was wonderful to see that stream of water gushing out from the foot of the barren mountain.

Again we took up our pilgrimage, and in thirty minutes we came within sight of the modern village of Wadi Musa. We were all very hungry and tired. The guide advised going to the house of the Mudir. That personage welcomed us, and we found him a decent sort of man and not altogether ignorant. He seemed to have heard nothing of the progress which was transforming the world. The pre-war inhabitants of this place were the Arab nomads, but now the poor Armenian exiles had to share with them the heat of the burning sun in the peninsula. The Turkish Government had thrown some of them into this little solitary village, with the sole aim of ending their existence, as they were not accustomed to so severe a climate. We went through the lanes and saw those poor young women and old men sitting idle, having nothing to do but to count their miserable days. Here they were doomed to starvation. Some of them, however, have been very busy studying the historic remains of Petra. They would be gone for days, I was told by the Mudir, visiting the caves and carrying on excavations. I heard that some of them had found many interesting antiques and relics, which they were waiting—if they lived—to show to the world, when they had gained release from the desert.

We found that the principal entrance to Petra is through a narrow ravine cut through the rocks and bounded on each side by superb tombs. For twenty-five minutes we walked in this long approach, the walls of which in some places are only from ten to twelve feet apart. At some points the sides meet overhead and form a vault. These walls on both sides contain many interesting carvings. All along one side there is a waterway, which formerly was meant to bring water to the city.

Everything is solemn and quiet here. No voice of any kind is heard save the screech of an owl or a passing vulture. Oleanders and other small shrubs grow in the cutting. We reached at last the most elaborate of the ruins, which nature has preserved through thousands of years to attest the power and ability of man. It is called by the Bedouins “Pharoah's Treasury,” or “Castle.” It is impossible to convey a just impression of the effect produced when one beholds for the first time these works of art which though carved thousands of years ago, yet have a modern and up-to-date appearance. The exterior is richly embellished with architectural decorations. In front of all is a colonnade of four columns, standing between two pilasters.

This “treasury” is all of it is hewn out of the rock.

FROM FIGHTING TO FRIENDLINES

Thirty Discordant Racial Groups at Chester, Pa., Being Blended into One by Community Servic

By M. A. ROSE

THERE lives in Chester, Pa., a small, frail, but exceedingly energetic priest who devotes his abundant stock of benevolence and vigor to serving an Italian parish. One dark night he was called to the door of the rectory, and as he swung it open, a strange Italian inquired if this was the priest.

"Si, signor," replied the good father.

A knife flashed in the light that streamed from within the rectory, and as it descended it slashed the priest's face from ear to upper lip.

The mystery never has been solved; that is, the identity of the priest's assailant remains unknown; but there is little doubt as to the cause for the assault. It was but one manifestation of the bitterness between the Italian Catholics and Protestants.

The reverend father will wear the scar to his dying day, but the city of Chester will not. It is no strained metaphor to say that Chester was torn and scarred by racial and denominational hatreds as few cities in America ever have been rent. The history of the municipality is typical; it is an epitome of the story of America. Chester is Pennsylvania's oldest city, according to tradition. In it Washington wrote his report of the battle of Brandywine and there Lafayette had his wounds dressed. The oldest building in continuous use in America is said to be Chester's city hall, which stands near the ancient tavern which Washington frequented in his journeys from Mount Vernon to Philadelphia.

Colonial conditions gave way inevitably to modern industrialism. Chester, in 1917, was a thriving manufacturing town of 50,000.

No longer American, it was polyglot. No longer living in simple Colonial friendliness and the neighborly intimacy of early days, Chester was the sojourning-place of a score of races drawn there and held there only because its factories offered jobs.

THEN came the war, accentuating all that was evil in that situation. Chester became one of the great war production centers with its huge shipbuilding yards and other industries. The population of Chester jumped from 50,000 to 100,000. The races and creeds multiplied apace, and worse, their hatreds and feuds increased in intensity. Chester was not a community at all, if a community means a place with anything of a common interest in a common life.

No one knows the exact figures to this day, but there were on the payroll of the largest shipbuilding company thirty nationalities, or racial groups. There were perhaps 20,000 negroes; 5,000 to 10,000 Italians; 3,000 to 6,000 Poles; Russians, Greeks, Ukrainians, and Lithuanians, perhaps 1,000 apiece; Mexicans in constantly increasing numbers.' These are the important groups. For a complete roster, read the roll of the nations on both sides as signed to the peace treaty of Versailles.

"Never before in twenty-two years of social service have I encountered such divisions and fierce feeling between groups of such splendid people," says Charles Frederick Weller.

Into this dangerous and discouraging whirlpool of sordid, money-grabbing jealousy, hatred and rancor—all intensified by the fact that the home lands of these immigrants were engaged in deadly battle overseas—plunged War Camp Community Service.

It did not enter Chester in any spirit of gratuitous or officious desire to be intermeddling. It was called to the service. The War and Navy Departments recognized very soon after hostilities began the necessity of preserving the morale not only of the men in service, but of the workers in the munitions and shipbuilding communities as well.

That was War Camp's invitation and authorization, its call and likewise almost a command to see what could be done to promote a spirit of cooperation, amity, contentment, patriotism, where there was nothing but discord.

Colored soldiers welcomed home by War Camp

THE problem was solved through play, or recreation, if you like the longer word. Obviously there was no trouble while Chester's thousands were at work; the trouble was with their leisure. What should they do with their leisure?

Well, when War Camp began there was very little they could do with it that would help them really to refresh themselves for the next day's work. There were commercial amusement enterprises, some of them good enough and some of them actually bad. Good and bad, they were inadequate to the doubled population. There were no parks large enough to care for either the adults or the children. The schools were locked up except when there were classes. As for the negroes, they were the worst off of all. There had been bloody race riots.

There were social agencies at work in Chester, but they had not united their resources, and one of the faults which they had not learned to overcome was that "all foreigners looked alike" to them.

War Camp workers began by holding a series of conferences with the leaders of the Italian colony, Catholic, Protestant and freethinkers. As a result of this counsel, a Community Service Center was opened in the Franklin School. A program of popular music was offered, Italian song-sheets printed in Italian, war-time songs in English, vaudeville stunts, homeopathic doses of the spoken word and big allopathic draughts of good fellowship. Question cards were distributed asking what those who gathered at the entertainment would like to do at Franklin School The answers showed they wanted a public reading-room with newspapers, magazines and books; national games and folk dances; they wanted such as bands, orchestras, quartettes and ch many wanted club rooms; a few wanted to k they might not spend some of their leisure i manual training room, using the tools to mend hold furniture or to make new pieces. Some w games, such as checkers, chess, dominoes and pa

Much of this program was carried out. Prot and Catholic Italians aren't slashing each ot Chester any more. There is a "family gathe every Thursday in the school. There are clas English two days a week. A French-Belgian s meets every Friday. There are games and dances in the large room. Ther piano, and entertainments are giv the stage of the auditorium—the ery made, by the way, in the m training room.

FIVE public schools and one rochial school in Chester an public school building in the adj borough of Eddystone have bee veloped successfully as comm centers. The Franklin School c is not unique; it is typical.

That is only part of what was Twenty vacant lots in Chester been developed by the War Ca department of athletics and phy education. The good thus done i calculable. For example, a whole of jitney busses are routed to pa corner where stands a Polish paro school. Two or three hundred dren used to play in the streets al the school, waiting for the session begin. Now the black-robed sis are on the playground every morn leading the youngsters in play, which they find m more attractive than their old romps on the stre Two or three hundred children made safe—and outlay on this lot was $50.

There was another aspect to the cleaning up these lots. They grew in summer with weeds feet tall, and in this jungle nightly such evils fo shelter as made them the abode of social pestile Out by the Jones School, a negro district, "M Sheppard, War Camp's athletic director in Ches found such a lot. He set up posts for basketball g and for the volley ball nets. Bringing out his twen five dollar box of balls, bats and quoits, he said to negro children and youths, "These are yours to p with when you clean up the lot." Evening leis hours in that race riot center have been transmu from civic liabilities to assets.

THIS is not the whole story of the demonstrati in Chester of the good that may be done bringing order and neighborliness out of chaos a enmity. But it is enough of the story to illustra It will not stop with the passing of war conditio Chester will not let it stop. Chester, and scores other American communities which have found the selves in this way, entreat and insist that these go fruits be not lost. So a way has been found to car on.

Community Service, Inc., the heir to the expe ence of War Camp Community Service, and, be of it, of the Playground and Recreation Associati of America's decade of experience, has been organiz in response to this call. It hopes to direct and inspi nationally a movement to make us all Americans, a neighbors, through the helpful and happy utilizatio of our ever-increasing leisure hours.

The True Path to Unity

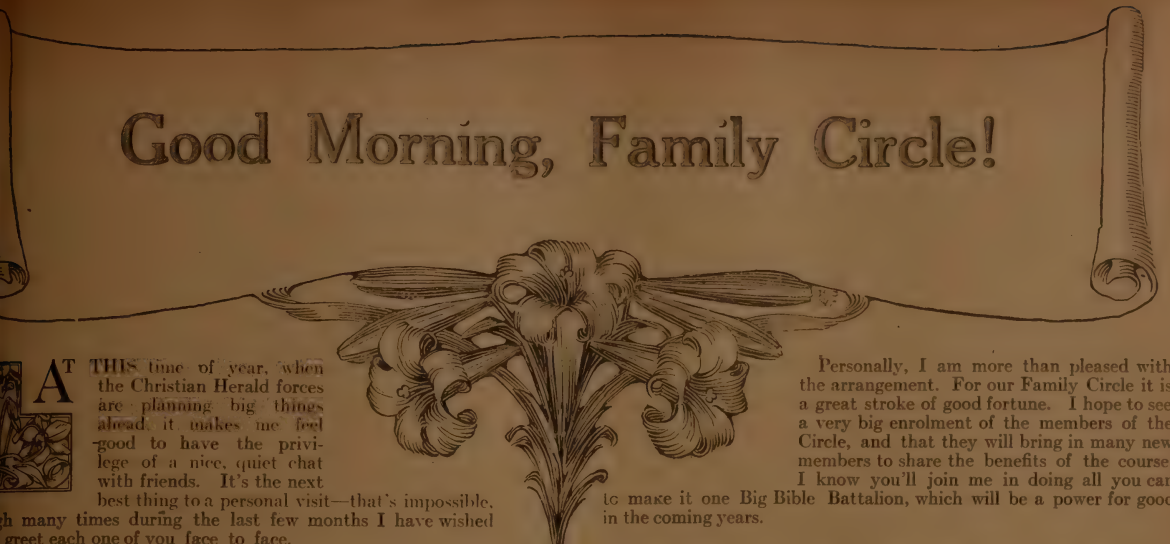
SHORTLY after the International Christian Endeavor Conference in Buffalo, Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder of the movement, conversing in the Christian Herald office in New York, said that one of the things for which the conference was remarkable was the strong spirit of Christian Unity expressed in the addresses of several of the speakers. This may be regarded as the spontaneous and logical outcome of a movement which has its basis in harmonious Christian fellowship, and in whose membership many denominations are represented. Its flourishing condition, its increasing numbers, and its steady expansion of activities are in a large measure due to the spirit of Christian Unity which prevails within its ranks. Such addresses are an index of the glowing convictions which are being expressed in assemblages throughout the country.

There is, however, an undeniable call for some stronger voice than has yet been given utterance—for a voice that will cry aloud to the Christian churches of America pointing out the true path to be followed. There are many notable preachers who do not hesitate to declare their convictions. They have witnessed the beginning of the Unity movement, but the ultimate development they cannot foresee. Still, they feel assured that the great aim will be realized, though not without a struggle; and when that point is reached the elements that have blocked the way to Unity may find themselves facing a situation which compels the choice between a united and harmonious Christian Church, or an acknowledgment of decadence and of failure to grasp the great opportunity which must therefore pass into other hands.

We do not share this apprehension, however. The Christian Herald believes today, as it has always held, that the Church of Christ will be true to her glorious record and will rise above all her present troubles. Dr. Jowett, in one of his sermons, discusses the critics who picture the Church as senile, as wearing obsolete armor, as torpid, as burdened with dead timber, as the target of much worthless advice, and so forth. He does believe, however, that there is need of a larger ministry and of a supreme effort to recover the fulness of her Gospel and apply it to the world's needs. It is a Gospel which meets the whole of human requirements. It deals not with this or that form of service, but it is the spiritual message in whic every branch of the Church can join as with a singl voice. That Gospel is neither out of date nor outgrown. Its charm is indestructible, its power unsurpassed, its fulness as great as when Christ first gave i utterance and the evangelists won over the ancien world to its acceptance. It is the same Gospel today and can be as effective as ever, if the Church so wills It is capable of awakening the people everywhere and of reinvigorating the churches and uniting them as one.

Dr. Jowett is a generous critic and believes, as we do, that the attitude of all right-thinking people toward the Church in the present-day situation should be helpful rather than hostile. Nevertheless, the King's business requires haste. We hope to hear from many quarters, during the coming fall and winter, of the progress being made by the Unity movement among the different denominations in the same cheerful and confident note as that which marked the addresses in the Christian Endeavor Conference.

Good Morning, Family Circle!



AT THIS time of year, when the Christian Herald forces are planning big things ahead it makes me feel good to have the privilege of a nice, quiet chat with friends. It's the next best thing to a personal visit—that's impossible, ough many times during the last few months I have wished uld greet each one of you face to face.

am going to tell you quite frequently the plans of the Christian ld as they develop.

uring the eight years of my continuous connection with the paper, ve been increasingly interested in the many big enterprises you carried through so successfully; and now, with closer relation- I have learned to appraise the splendid spirit back of the paper— spirit that binds you like a great big household to deeds of kindness helpfulness the world over. That's what I have always liked about Christian Herald. There isn't any wasted power—any energy aim- y spent. Instead of talk everlasting, it says: "Come and do it!" what with missionary work, orphan work and Christian work of y kinds all over the world, it has taught us the value of applied istianity—doing the things we have been longing to do, and making eel that we ourselves are not mere idle spectators, but have an ve share in humanity's uplift.

BUT, friends, there are now calling us bigger things; the world is in transition. The war has drawn the whole human family closer together. The world's statesmanship, its religion, its industrial social life, are all in process of reconstruction. We, too, must e our share in all that relates to the spiritual and material changes going on. Each of you, individually, will have your part to y in the big job of making the world, as President Wilson says, "a ter place to live in"—not only for the oppressed nations in other ds, but for our own folks here at home, millions of whom need a ndly, helping hand.

hink of the spiritual poverty of a nation, one-half of whose people not even nominal church-members!

ow are we going to get the interest of the other half?

any thousands of earnest and active church workers have asked mselves this question.

n many communities they are making a fine start toward increasing interest in the church and its activities by making the church the community center.

he Christian Herald is going to run some wonderful stories that read romances, telling of churches that have been made the all-impor- t factor in a community—the common ground for entertainment, truction and social intercourse.

Rather than interfering with the spiritual development of a com- unity, we find that this movement has had a most stimulating effect on the deeper church work.

We need, above all other things, to have a general spiritual arousal, ew inspiration and invigoration straight from the great Source, "the failing Fountain of the Word," as our friend Dr. Jowett calls it.

AND this brings me to something of prime interest to every reader of the Christian Herald. I wish all of you could know my friend Dr. Gray, dean of the Moody Institute in Chicago. He is one the ripest Bible scholars of my acquaintance. When I first told him our plan to establish a Christian Herald Bible Course, he was greatly eased with the idea. He came to New York the other day, and we lked over the project quite fully. He entered heartily into all of our ans, and now he has placed at our disposal, as already announced, e best teaching staff in America for Bible study work—men of broad hristian scholarship, who, while representing different denominations, e sound on the fundamentals and a unit in their successful methods. e have had the organization of a Bible Course under consideration a long time, but the realization of our hopes has only now been ade possible. All the plans are made for a six months' course, beginning in October.

Personally, I am more than pleased with the arrangement. For our Family Circle it is a great stroke of good fortune. I hope to see a very big enrolment of the members of the Circle, and that they will bring in many new members to share the benefits of the course. I know you'll join me in doing all you can to make it one Big Bible Battalion, which will be a power for good in the coming years.

READERS of the Christian Herald have always liked the stories written by Grace Livingston Hill (Mrs. Lutz). They are intensely human, and so true to nature that they are more like dramas of real life than fiction. Simplicity, too, is not the least of the charms of this author's work, for her stories always have a strong appeal to "folks" everywhere.

Now comes her latest story, "Betty Hope." You never know just what Mrs. Lutz will do with a hero or heroine. This particular heroine is a daughter of wealth—who is involved in a tangle of troubles. Facing a loveless marriage, she resolves upon a stratagem, by which to escape. She runs away. Happiness comes to her at last, but she passes through a series of experiences, every step of which the reader will follow with breathless interest.

The real heroine of the story is not the pampered daughter of wealth, very charming though she is, but an American working girl—a clear-headed, simple-hearted, genuine soul—who is ready with a helping hand when most needed. Jane Carson has a romance of her own, but she is of the strong, self-reliant type that faces difficulties courageously. How this generous-hearted girl brought about the unraveling of many entanglements and led to a happy climax—how all these things came about, our friends must find out for themselves by reading the story.

One of the strongest elements in the story is the spiritual influence which the runaway encountered in the humble home where she found shelter. Ma Carson—a motherly soul and a good Christian—radiated kindness all about her. Her simple faith and trustful ways not only comforted the stranger, but gave her a new outlook on life and its meaning.

The author has written many stories and her work has always delighted our readers. We regard "Betty Hope" as the best of all her literary ventures. The opening chapter of the story will appear in the Christian Herald in an October issue, and the story will run almost two months.

What can the Church do for the community? This is a vital question in these times of reconstruction and readjustment. I am zealously seeking the full answer and we are going to have some tremendously interesting articles, telling exactly what is being done. It's my sincere conviction that, when the Church rises to its full opportunity and does its whole duty toward its community, crime, vice, disorder, most of the poverty and much of the disease must disappear as mists and darkness vanish at the shining of the sun. Do you know that in more than three hundred towns in our country Community Clubs have been established, mostly by church people, Men's Classes and Ladies' Aid Societies? We're going to give definite information about this great movement, the rapid growth of it, the methods that are proving successful and the purposes that vitalize it, in impressing the influence of the Church upon those who do not go to church, and in seeking the Spirit of Christ as leaven to the entire community. There are many fascinating, inspiring accounts to be given of this movement, and they are on the way.

THUS, you see, the Christian Herald is striving to the utmost to deserve more than ever the confidence and loyalty of its large circle of readers.

It is my earnest hope to make it more and more an abiding family institution, an inspiring and vitalizing influence in the church and the home.

Cordially yours,

Graham Patterson

President.

THE BOY IN COLLEGE

America's Greatest Educator Holds That the First Duty of the Universities Is the Formation of Mo Character—How the Roistering Student Has Been Transformed

By MURRAY G. BREESE

WHAT has become of the roistering student? How has he been transformed? What caused the evolution from the reckless to the serious, studious phase of things collegiate as expressed by the college freshman?

Indeed, contact with college life, the student part of it, reveals these days a remarkable amount of consideration given to such themes as "student health," "student uplift," and other subjects having the students' moral welfare under consideration. The education of the youths is given no less consideration than previously, but the spiritual welfare of the future greats has become a matter of much moment, with the result that either the youthful college entrants have changed materially in their make-up or the efforts of the college authorities have had rich returns.

Something of the scope of the general trend is revealed in the work of one indicative case, that of Harvard University. Character building is one of the major aims of this institution. Here that responsibility is accepted in contrast to the hit-and-miss method of the boasted German way.

"We have the job," President A. Lawrence Lowell said recently, "of looking after our undergraduates, of teaching them and of forming their character. You must furnish them the conditions, and if you furnish them the conditions to produce ideal men, they will produce ideal men."

President Lowell stipulates as "the first duty" of the university and college the formation of character. This educator gives high place to the moral condition of the undergraduate. At the same time he sounds no alarums. By "moral conditions" this head of the oldest college in the United States does not mean the avoidance of the grosser sins of life, because he "is happy to say" that the undergraduate body of the United States is extremely free from these taints. He holds the young college men in America a singularly straight lot compared with those of any other country in the world. He defines positive morality as not less important than negative morality.

TO INCULCATE the proper kind of ambition, the proper attitude toward the problems of the world, duty in life, sense of public responsibility and responsibility for those about you, this educator asserts that the proper atmosphere must be produced. Two methods of treating the attitude of the university toward its students are in sharp contrast. One is that which has reached its height and is typified by the people of Germany. Under this method the university offers opportunities for instruction which may be accepted or ignored. The private morality of the student and his attitude toward life in general are not deemed the business of the university at all. It is entirely a question of opportunities to be accepted or ignored as the student wills. The other method is known as the English one, which recognizes that the formation of character is the important part of the duty of the university.

According to the German method a situation was produced, so Bismarck asserted, under which "one-third of the students drank themselves to death, one-third died from overwork, and the other third ruled Europe."

The American method is not only to provide the opportunities but the inducement to take advantage of the opportunities, and the added or natural outgrowth of this inducement is for the student to do his duty all the rest of his life.

At Harvard it is held that there are two important ways in which to form character. One is to get the students together in such a way that they recognize their duty toward one another, and the other is to get them in contact with the professors in such a way that the direct influence can be exerted upon them.

GETTING the students together in the proper and feasible way is being accomplished at Cambridge to a marked degree, by building dormitories to attract the students from the private dormitories. It was true at one time that unless a man lived at one of the fashionable private dormitories he could not get in the fashionable clubs. This was held to be an unhealthy condition, with the result that the university has been erecting the freshman halls and to a greater and greater degree these university dormitories are being constructed as funds permit. It is pointed out that these dormitories are not highly remunerative because of the initial cost, and because good buildings which will last can be constructed only out of the best materials. To bring the men together, however, a low price must be charged. Fancy prices cannot be charged, it has been found, if the university is to bring together the unknown boys and those from the fashionable boarding-schools, those from the East and those from the West. The object, however, is not to charge all the same price, but to charge all a low price. It is not true democracy to say that all persons are social equals because their houses are all of the same value.

President Lowell believes that results have demonstrated the justification of the Harvard way of forming character. He believes this was shown by the accomplishments and contributions of college men during the war. The war, he said, left no doubts as to the character of the young collegians and the older graduates. These college men, Dr. Lowell asserts, will rise and have risen to any point to which it has been made clear to them that they ought to rise.

It is remarkable to the observer to what extent formation of character is considered at this institution and others. It is interesting, too, to learn from the regent of Harvard, Professor Matthew Luce, that the students themselves, no less than the university authorities, are eager to cooperate in the general welfare and the formation of character.

"The regent," Professor Luce recently told a gathering of "old grads," "is the liaison officer between the students and the college authorities, and there is a remarkable eagerness on the part of the students to cooperate with the regent."

Numerous problems of student life, the regent admitted, have been solved by means of this cooperation which otherwise might have remained puzzling. The proctors, student advisers and the advisory council are all mediums of importance and contributors toward the important character-building.

IN STUDENT hygiene or student help, the preventive rather than the curative process is the aim. The object of this department is not the student who is sick, although he comes under the supervision of the department. Rather, Roger Lee, professor of hygiene in charge, points out that the man sought is the one who ordinarily would not come under the care of the university authorities.

Professor Lee says the initial examination of freshmen shows that there are just as many young men who think they are sick and are not as there are young students who think they are well and are sick. The object of this department is to find as many boys who are as well as possible and to advise weaklings who ordinarily would not go to a physician for consultations. The whole attitude of this department of student help is that of the "talk-it-over" method.

The freshman physical examination brings the students in touch with the advisers, and the fact grows upon the former that the department of student help is what the young men call "safe," that there is no secret channel between its office and that of the central office of the university, which is supposed erroneously to be trying to find out secret things about the student. This result is a freedom of consultation and the submitting to those in charge of all sorts of problems outside the realm of medicine and hygiene but which nevertheless are important to the student.

To the student who is ill the immediate sickness is the thing of import, and he does not discuss with his physician the general problems of boyhood. To all the consultants sound general advice is given in a conversational way. That it is not confined to the medical is a part of the entire new scheme of things in the university, whereby the older men like the regent, the assistant deans and the professor of hygiene and others are freely available to the students for consultation of their problems, from health and politics to home conditions.

Thus the department of student hygiene or student help, as its heads prefer to describe it, is not one to be shunned, but one, in the thought of the student, to be sought.

In the province of this department comes the activity of student physical exercise. One experiment is under way on an ambitious scale which has for its object the effort to interest all boys in some sort of wholesome games or sports. Four characteristics of sports are taken as the ideal. They are, that they preferably should be out of doors, that they should be good fun, that they should be competitive, and that they should be games which will interest the students in their after life when they shall have been graduated—games in which fairly elderly gentlemen may indulge, such as tennis and golf.

SO FAR as social diseases are concerned, the Harvard authorities believe that the best attack which can be made upon them and their prevention is not their featuring, which leads the boys to become introspective and to think more of things sexual than is good for them, but rather to inculcate in the youth of the country—the men who are going to be the future teachers, leading men of the country and fathers of families—certain wholesome habits of living, including physical exercise. In this connection it is worthy of mention that the university authorities have persuaded the United States Interdepartmental Social Hygiene Board that this is the best method of ceeding in the attack upon social diseases.

The whole trend of treating sexual hygien Harvard institution is to meet it in its proper everlasting relation to other things and not to fea it.

The "talking-it-over" method prevails also in dean's office of many schools. Acting Dean Ch N. Greenough of Harvard explains that the un graduates need a sort of friendly coaching from dean's office, while the men taking up graduate w on the other hand, have acquired the ability to efficiently with less advising and caring for. dean's office, he says, may be a place where a stu comes only when he is sent for to be admonishe punished; or it may be a place where he will c voluntarily for advice or the clearing away of diffi ties, large and small. The ideal office is describe one where the student is given attention and frie consultation, and where there is a spirit of mu help between the office and the student.

Such are some of the broader phases of chara formation of college students. There is, of co direct religious instruction for those who desir There are the daily chapel services, but for dec there has been nothing compulsory in the admini tion of its ministering material. There is also Phillips Brooks House, a center of things religi philanthropic and social. Through its associa it unites the members of Harvard University in ested in these things, such as the Harvard Univer Christian Association, and other religious organ tions. The scope of its work is shown by the re that 275 students were engaged in its work we and its social service included boys' clubs, athl instruction, teaching night schools, teaching cla of immigrants English and good citizenship, juv court work, Boy Scout work, "big brother" w definite religious work, and other activities.

HARVARD believes strongly in individualism independence, and in no more marked wa this shown than in its connection with the welfar the moral, spiritual and physical welfare—of student. The basic principles are, as stated, t the student be made cognizant of his responsib to his fellow students, society in general, himself the world. Religious principles are not forced u him, or attendance at religious services, as was o the case. The way is pointed out and the high id shown and the peaks which he can attain revealed

One has described the freshman as one at f having a feeling of confusion, then of strange elat that his elders have given him his head. One no preacher is quoted as having said that as a freshm he had the feeling that he might "go to the devil fast as he pleased," all restraint having been tak away. Still another said that the freshman's vi point should be one of reverence and religious a toward his university, while toward himself it shou be one of profound confidence without losing si of the opportunities provided.

President Lowell was of the opinion that "t things men suffer most from in college are a swel head and a contracted heart, two things which their power could largely be overcome." Wh statement formed the basis of a sermonette on sl ness and how to overcome it.

Few men have spoken words of advice more f quently to freshmen and undergraduates than l Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harva and probably few men have been listened to by you college men with greater interest, attention and a vantage. Such addresses are fraught with who someness, which influences the college boy. I Eliot has spoken many a helpful word to freshm anent looking ahead in college life and afterlife. has advised in favor of early marriages. Dr. Eliot summed up "forelooking" for studer in one address to freshmen as follows:

> It is better to hold a hopeful idea of the power of sustair enjoyment as life goes on, an enjoyment which increases rat than diminishes. How common are the laments about capacities and disabilities of advancing years and the shri ing in pleasures! It is true that some pleasures which requ keen senses do shrink; but, on the other hand, the intellect and moral delights increase in intensity as life goes on, a many physical satisfactions can be held level to the end. College students undoubtedly, in the present da have more opportunities for character-formatio and undoubtedly, too, they use and take advanta of the opportunities to a greater degree than ever.

THE LIGHT OF THE FUTURE

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I HAD luncheon with Minnie yesterday. Minnie s a girl who belongs to my club in a certain Setlement House and we have struck up a curiusly close friendship, quite apart from clubs and ment Houses—a friendship in which there is no nd take, only a splendid warmth and trust.

nie is just sixteen and she works as a bookeer—an unusual position for a sixteen-year-old in a loft where a wholesale waist business is d on. Yesterday at luncheon we talked together her work.

ow did you learn, so young, to do what you're t?" I questioned. "I always thought that a had to study hard to be a bookkeeper."

did study hard, Miss Margaret," Minnie an- d. "I took a commercial course in school. I it when I was twelve, and I never missed a and after a while I got to like the figuring. Some girls used to say that they couldn't make any ,out of what they were trying to learn—but I they weren't as anxious, perhaps, as I was, to head." She paused, and to break the interval of e I asked another question.

'ut, Minnie," I asked, "didn't you find it hard, teen, to go to work in a real office? Didn't you a great many problems you couldn't solve?"

h, sure I did, Miss Margaret!" answered Minnie "but I kept right on stuying, nights, until I leaed more about my wo. I'm still studying. Th fall I'm going to take an xamination to be an acuntant. I hope that I pa!"

looked at Minnie with an dded respect. "I think," I told her, "that re the only one in the who really wants to y—hard. I know that re the only one who to night school. How that happen?"

nd then it was that Minnie spoke with a wis- far beyond her sixteen s.

I guess," she said slow- "that the other girls ld go to night school, if they felt the way I bout book-learning, and ing ahead. But lots of ng people don't think t the next year or two. y don't think of what y want to be when y're twenty-five, or thirive, or forty-five. They sort of let things take of themselves. And ngs don't—not often!" s from Minnie, at sixn!

JUST at this time young people all over the coun- are getting ready to go k to their lessons. They bringing out school- ks, poring over college rses, planning study rs. Some of them are ng to school, as Minnie going to school, because y are looking far ahead. ne are going because ir parents or guardians ist upon it. Some are ng because of the fun t's in it.

School is something that nparatively few young ple take very seriously. dn't, myself, realize the lue of an education when was getting it. I remember the many drawings that nade behind the covers of my huge geography book geographies, unfortunately, aren't large, any more, they were. I remember the verses I wrote when I ould have been studying Latin prose, and the story ts that I constructed when our professor was lecring on chemistry. That is why, today, I'm hazy my mind as to the exact location of certain counes, about boundary lines, and capital cities. That why word construction is not so fascinating to me it is to some people—why Latin roots are more or s of an unsolved mystery. That is why I don't derstand the chemical reasons for certain much scussed facts—why I can't explain to questioning ildren why salt melts ice, and why diamonds cut s! At the time when other folk were storing those ts away for the future I was drawing pictures and writing bits of verse. The pictures and the verse are lost now, and so are the facts that I might have been the possessor of! For it isn't easy to go back and learn the lessons that you have missed.

I know many people who have never had the opportunity to acquire an education. Some of them are brilliant personalities who have risen from the ranks; some of them have prospered amazingly in the world's goods and the world's respeet without the benefit of book training. But there isn't one of them—no matter how spectacular his success had been—who hasn't said to me, at one time or another:

"I'd sacrifice a good many years of my life to have had a good solid background—the sort of a background that education gives. Nothing makes up for the lessons that I might have learned."

I WAS talking a few days ago with the father of three half-grown boys. He is sending them, at no little expense, to the finest school that lies within his reach, and he spoke to me very seriously about the flippant way that they regarded their opportunities.

To an old Schoolhouse

DOWN by the end of the lane it stands.
  Where the sumac grows in a crimson thatch,
Down where the sweet wild-berry patch
Holds out a lure for eager hands.
Down at the end of the lane, who knows
  The ghosts that sit at the well-scarred seats,
  When the dark of the moon, and the gray sky meets
With the dawntime light, and a chill wind blows?

Ghosts—well, not ghosts, perhaps, but dreams—
  Rather like wistful shades, that stand
  Waiting a look or an outstretched hand
To call them back where the morning gleams—
Dreams of the hopes we had, that died;
  Dreams of the vivid youth we sold;
  Dreams of a pot of rainbow gold—
Gold that was sought for, eager-eyed!

Dreams of the plans we made, that sleep
  With the lesson books on the dusty rack;
  Of the joyous years that will not come back—
That are drowned in the tears we have learned to weep.
Ghosts did I call them. Sweet they are
  As a plant that grows in a desert place;
  Sweet as a dear remembered face—
Sweet as a pale courageous star.

Where the sumac grows in a flaming wall
  It stands, at the end of a little lane,
  And there do the children come again,
Answering still the bell's shrill call,
Just as we came, with their songs unsung,
  And their hopes all new, and their dreams dew-kissed:
  Brave as the sun in a land of mist—
Just as we came when the world was young!

"I never had the chances they are having," he told me. "We of the last generation didn't have the advantages that the children of today are having. It hurts me to see my boys laughing at their professors, neglecting their lessons, playing truant. It hurts me because I know that some day they'll regret bitterly their lack of knowledge along certain lines. When they have children of their own they'll realize, as I realize, that they have passed over some important details. I missed my chance—they're avoiding that same chance. And it makes me very unhappy to see them do it!"

SCHOOL days, without a spark of fun, of relaxation, of, yes, mischief—would be dull indeed. The child in grammar school and the young man or woman in college would miss a great deal in the way of wholesome good fun and vitally radiant memories if they did nothing but grind away at their books. They'd miss the broader viewpoint, the larger outlook upon life. They would become, in a way, narrow and self-centered.

But the person who plays through all of the lesson time misses much more than the person who never plays. For that person loses the groundwork upon which a future can be built. He misses the fundamental truths and the elementary equations which would, in time, become rungs on the ladder of success and achievement.

I have heard many young people speak frivolously of giving up their school or college courses for some trivial reason. And whenever I hear them I feel—as the father of the boys felt—an actual sense of pain. For a year or two of study can count so tremendously that it is nothing to be brushed lightly aside. I have correspondents—boys and girls—who walk miles to go to school, who work their way through college, who economize really painfully to get the year or two that these others throw away.

Education is a groundwork. It is a foundation. It is more than that—it is a training for the years to come. It gives one a standard to judge by, a set of ideals to live with, and a light to paint a path through a world that may sometimes seem dark.

For lessons do not end with school days. Life is full of lessons that grow in proportion with the growth of one's understanding—just as lessons grow harder as you progress in school from class to class. A student would never be able to do his problems in solid geometry if he hadn't first mastered arithmetic. He wouldn't be able to read Virgil if he hadn't first conjugated some Latin verbs. And life is that way. If you've neglected the initial lessons in the school of life, you will find all lessons that the future holds a little harder to learn.

Knowledge is a great many things. It is power, it is confidence. But, most of all, knowledge is light. A light that shows, plainly, true values, and true dangers. and true worth. Without that light a student in life's school—and we're all of us that—is apt to stumble.

Our Bird Friends

EVERY boy and girl who has ever lived in the country knows the beauty of the birds, but some of us do not realize that the birds were put on this earth for other reasons than to make a pretty sight as they fly by, or to sing us sweet songs.

The birds are one of the greatest helps to mankind that ever lived, for every day they destroy one of our enemies, the insects.

The world is filled with insects, some of them so tiny that we do not notice them. They live in the trees and eat the bark, the leaves, and the fruit. They live in the garden and eat the vegetables, some of them eating the roots, and others the plant above the ground. If these insects were not destroyed they would in a very few weeks kill everything in the farmer's fields, for in one year these insects hatch so many eggs that there are a thousand baby insects at the end of the summer.

If you will only try you can make the birds understand that you are grateful for what they are doing for you. Every boy and girl can be a policeman for the birds. If a boy has a gun and is going to shoot at a bird tell him what the bird is doing for him. When you see a bird nesting in a tree, keep away, for if you go so close as to frighten Mrs. Bird she will leave her nest, and not come back, leaving the baby birds to die. In the summer you can put out a low basin of water so that the birds can drink and bathe, and early spring when the song birds just come back from the South, you can feed them with crumbs. C. C. S.

IN THEIR OWN TONGUE

The Second Part of the Story of the Education of the Rev. Emery Clark

By MARY SHERBURNE WARREN

SYNOPSIS OF PART ONE

THE Rev. Emery Clark, pastor of the one church in Fairfield, a prosperous New England community, is advised by Deacon Holway that the committee has decided to ask him to resign, hoping to find in his place "some one more like Mr Harper," his predecessor, a young man who not only accomplished much for the spiritual and moral good of the community, but, through his extensive knowledge of farming principles, had been able to give advice along agricultural lines that had helped many to increase the productiveness of their farms. After hearing Mr. Harper's unique methods discussed in detail Emery Clark returned to the attractive parsonage, wrote his resignation and reluctantly broke the news to his wife. Eunice took this opportunity to inform her husband that, though sixty-one, he was five years younger than the greatest general in the world, and advised him to pocket his family and ministerial pride and learn many things from the Fairfield farmers that he might be better equipped to enter into the life of the people in his next parish. The following Sunday Emery Clark read his resignation, amended to take effect two weeks before the arrival of his successor, and on Monday mornin; announced his arrival at Deacon Holway's with the question, "What is blight, please?"

"WHAT'S what?" demanded the deacon, decapitating a vigorous potato vine by an unfortunate stroke of his hoe as he whirled about at the question.

"Blight—potato blight," his pastor informed him. "I—er—have considered the advisability of acquainting myself with certain phases of farming before entering upon my duties in the next rural parish to which I am called. I contemplated taking a correspondence course, but my wife felt confident the farmers here would be willing to let me observe their methods and answer some questions during the few weeks I remain with them."

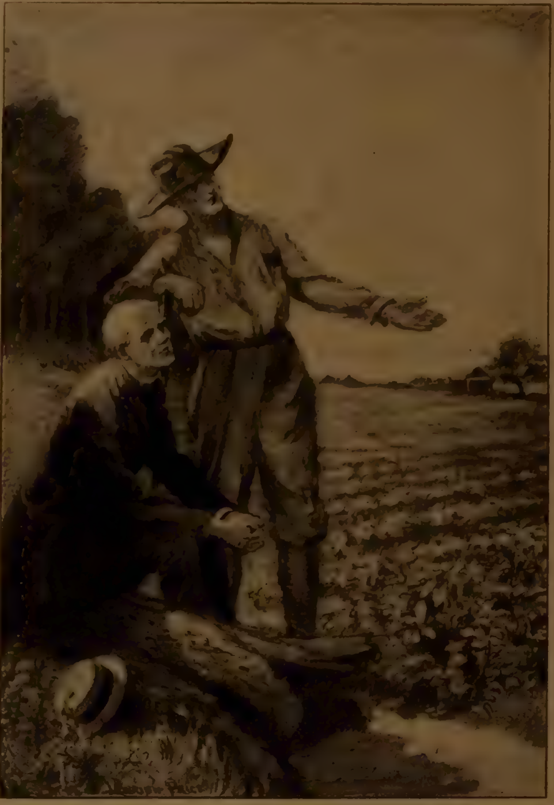
"Certainly; certainly," Daniel Holway assured him in a puzzled voice. "Certainly. Your wife's a good, sensible woman. We're sorry to lose her. Potato blight, is it? I can tell you more about potato blight than most any man in town except Tom Blodgett, because I've been a leetle slower learning to combat it. Now jest run your eye over Tom's potato piece across the fence, and then over mine. Note any difference between 'em?"

The Rev. Emery Clark followed the bidding of the farmer's stubby fore-finger and beheld an acre of potato tops that appeared to him, at first, an exact counterpart of those in the deacon's field. Upon closer inspection, however, he discovered brown spots upon several of the leaves, while here and there the discolorations had turned an unpleasant black.

"I can't brag much," admitted Daniel, "for I never did it jest right, myself, until this year. Now glance your eye round and tell me what is the only color you see in my field. Green? Exactly. I happened to be in the house one day last spring when Martha comes in from one of her visits round the farm, and says she, 'Daniel Holway, you're sixty-two years old, and I should like to know when you're going to begin spraying your potatoes early enough. They're most four inches high now. A farmer needs to live between three and four hundred years to give him time to learn to do things right.' I sorter jumped, as it ain't often Martha speaks up sharp like that, and, happening to land in front of the telephone, I called up Allan & Son and placed an order for all the spray material I'd need for a year, and that afternoon I sent my man down for it. I put some copper sulphate to soak that night and sprayed my potatoes the next morning—the first man in the neighborhood to do it too, as Martha found out at the Ladies' Aid that afternoon."

"This is, indeed, a revelation to me, Brother Holway," declared Emery Clark, for whom the speaker's animated face held more of interest than either potato field. "I should have said a prosperous farmer like you had little to learn at this time of life—that you were nearly ready to retire and enjoy the fruits of your labors."

"Retire at sixty-two!" ejaculated Daniel. "You jest begin to get interested when you're sixty-two. And I guess we shouldn't have many fruits to enjoy if we didn't keep raising 'em. Now you fire ahead on any question you want to know about potatoes and I'll try to answer it. I ain't very good on the lecture method, as Dick calls some of his college lessons."



"Now glance your eye around and tell me what is the only color you see in my field. Green? Exactly"

The Rev. Emery Clark seated himself upon the fallen trunk of an apple tree and begged for definite information in regard to the best soil for potatoes, the preparation of the seed, the time and manner of planting, the cultivation, harvesting and marketing of the tubers.

"There, sir!" the deacon exploded when he finished; "there ain't a thing I know about potatoes I've kept to myself. When you get home you'd better write some of it down so you won't get it mixed up with the other crops. I could give you advice about most everything connected with a farm, but most of us know more about some things than others, because they touch our heartstrings a leetle closer, I suppose. Now, take hens. It's quite a trick to raise hens, and it takes more patience than most men possess. Martha likes to have a few under foot, but they're too puttering little animals for me. But all you've got to do to make Ned Ransome preen his feathers is to mention hens in his hearing. He cleared eight hundred dollars from his flock of White Wyandottes last year and has got the figures to prove it. You want to plan to go down there early some day, for if you get him started by, say, ten o'clock he won't let go of you till milking time.

"Then you really ought to spend the next day at Jim Lowny's, so as not to make any trouble in the family. You see, Jim's a third or fourth cousin of Ned's and keeps Rhode Island Reds and can talk jest as fast as Ned can. It would be better still if you could start them off together some time, for you wouldn't lose any points that way. Just mention you've heard it said there wan't much to choose between White Wyandottes and Rhode Island Reds and watch the feathers fly.

"Now, when it comes to apples, Seth Martin's the only man in town that raises college educated apples. Some of us have started our trees going to college, but they ain't graduated yet. Now Seth loves an apple like a human being. Never seen Seth? Well, he hain't been out much since—I mean, lately. I dunno's Mr. Harper could have got him to church if he hadn't been up there talking about bees one day. He was always running in to see people, whether they believed in religion or not. Seth knows almost as much about bees as he does apples, and, while he was speechifying, Mr. Harper whips out a pad and writes down a few lines. 'Thank you, Mr. Martin,' he said; 'you have given me five points for my next sermon'—never asked him to come to hear it, or anything. then curiosity got the better of Seth's ment, and, the next Sunday morning, he into a back seat and hears a sermon on ind try on the farm and in the church, illustra at every turn by his own bees, and Seth too smart a man to allow himself to lose more sermons of that quality, and come ular after that. I ain't likely to forget sermon, either; for Martha got so excited bees that she begged me to get a few swar I said I wan't going to have any fidd buzzing bees on the place—hens was enough—but I give in, finally. I never reconciled until last summer, when we coul get much sugar and had to live on ho Honey on everything and honey in eve thing! That was a leetle the most sati tory summer I ever spent."

"I never realized before that there were many departments upon a farm in which man may become proficient," the minis found an opportunity to insert. "O lifetime is hardly long enough for him become an expert in all branches."

"No, it ain't," agreed Daniel, "unless has brains enough to make a business learning when he is young, same as my in-law and some others round here doing.

"Now the real money comes from da ing. If I knew as much about reg tered stock thirty-five years ago as I today I'd be as rich as I'd want to You see, I hated so to sell off my grad that I went into fullbloods gradually. Harper used to say that was the troub with farmers—they was too gradual. I said it wan't a sin for any one to ma money except ministers. Now it will ta me quite a spell to tell you all I kn about dairying, so I'll jest run down to house and inform Martha you're going stay to dinner. It will seem some like times. We never paid no attention to M Harper—treated him like one of the fa ily. He happened round so often we ne got no chance to invite him. That's al ever had against him. I got cheated out a lot of six-course invitation suppers that way."

During the next five weeks Emery Cl traveled miles through God's own count spending many hours with the cordial a voluble farmers, who were very glad "help him out." At several meals which he was made welcome he caug glimpses of contented family life that ma him wonder what added joys Paradi could hold. A third notebook was in or when he received a summons to preach a candidate in a town in the southern part the county. On his way home fr Edwin Spaulding's, where he had filled brain cell with information about hors he stopped at Deacon Holway's to reque him to find a substitute for the followi Sunday.

"You don't mind telling me where you going, do you?" queried the deacon as passed his milk pail to the hired man a motioned the minister to a seat on the ba piazza. "I feel acquainted enough to a that question now. Petersville!" he re peated when, after a moment of hesitatio the information was given. "Petersvil Ever been there? Well, I was once. mean, I went through. I didn't stop. was on one of the county agent's de onstration tours I never could find time for until M Harper announced right from the pulpit that he e pected every farmer that attended his church to g and, what was more, arranged for the autos take us.

"You see, our minister and the county agent, M Loveland, had got to be great friends borrowing eac other's farming books and bulletins from Washingto and from a dozen agricultural schools. And, tak them both together, they got the library down Norton to put in a supply of books that must hav cost 'em considerable. I've got one in the house o corn-raising I'll show you some time. Well, we see lot of interesting things on that tour. One was th only tractor that had come into the county at tha time; another was the best field of ensilage corn I eve set eyes on; and up on Ridgeway Hill was an acre o soy beans that we estimated would yield 'em seven an a half tons—mebbe eight. About two in the after noon we come to Petersville. I expected, of course they would have some show crops there, but the didn't—not a thing—and there wan't a single Pete ville man in the tour party, either.

"I asked Mr. Loveland how he accounted for he said folks down there was satisfied with themselves as they was. That's about all I know about place. Ed Spaulding could tell you more, for his s sister used to live there.

see you up in the pasture looking at Ed's colts afternoon. Beauties, ain't they? He didn't menwhat to do in case a colt took sick all of a sudden, he? He didn't! I'm surprised at Ed. If folks d here are going to instruct you they ought to do orough. I suppose I'll have to tell you that leetle myself. Mr. Harper couldn't stir Ed out to ch more than that elm tree over there because, ne reason, there wan't scarcely anything he could nim about farming, Ed having two boys teaching e agricultural school that kept him in touch with he latest ideas. Everything Ed tried turned out ccess, and he'd tried most everything up to seven s ago but raising colts, and then he had to try . For the first three years every colt lived and ved; then, all of a sudden, he lost three by sheer dent before they was a year and a half old, and, being used to bad luck, it made him nervous. The colt he had left of that age was shining coal black the handsomest thing in horseflesh ever raised is town.

One afternoon Ed went down to the pasture with e salt, but when he got to the fence he dropped dish and stared, for there was Princess Nan pawand twisting as if in awful pain and getting up and g down and getting up and lying down. As soon e could believe his eyes was telling him the truth rushed back to the house to call up the veterinary, nearly collapsed when he found he had a case on d and couldn't come for an hour. Ed was so beered then he couldn't think of anything to do to bury the colt alongside the other three before wife and the girls got back from the village and reached the woodshed door when he ran plump the minister. As soon as he could make out what trouble was Mr. Harper sprinted down to the ure and back and into the house, ordering Ed to a long-necked bottle, and five minutes later he pouring something down Princess Nan's throat.

I'd have given a five-dollar bill to seen Ed's face n that colt gradually ceased pawing and begun ting round for the choicest sprigs of grass, and can put as much into a face as any man I ever see. jest stood there looking from the colt to the minr and from the minister to the colt, and was still a-looking when his little grandson Eddie ran up with his hat full of green apples. Before he had tossed the first one over the fence Mr. Harper grabbed his hand telling him he guessed the Princess had had enough green apples for one day.

"Ed made the minister promise to keep the whole story a secret so we were the most surprised congregation that ever gathered in your church the next Sunday when Ed walked in and took a seat up front. We pumped Mr. Harper during the week, but not a word could we get out of him, though his eyes were aching to talk."

"Then how do you know all the details of this story—and what was in that bottle?" asked Emery Clark with interest.

"Well, you see, we was so pleased to have Ed come to church regular that we made considerable of him, and when we came to give Mr. Harper the farewell banquet we asked him to make a speech," elucidated the deacon. "Now I suppose I spent five solid hours thinking up the few fitting words I spoke, but all Ed had to do to hold our interest was to get up and tell that story about Princess Nan, and Ed can tell a story as well as any man I know. He didn't spare himself a mite. It was kind of a farewell thank offering to the minister and I guess it was as expensive as any given that night. Seth Martin says all you have to do now to stir up Ed is to ask him if he has plenty of soda, mustard and ginger on hand in case one of your horses should be took with colic and you should want to borrow some.

"Speaking of Seth reminds me that he was planning to hear you preach next Sunday, so I'm sorry you've got to be away. Seth says he hain't enjoyed himself so much for a long time as he has talking apples with you—that's because he does all the talking, I suppose. He reckoned it wan't any more than fair for him to listen to you one day a week.

"You said it was Petersville where you're going? I remember seeing the church down to Petersville, though it has been so long since it was painted, I wan't sure whether it was meant to be white or gray. And the only reason why I noticed what I took to be the parsonage was because it didn't bear no resemblance to ours. We've been looking round a leetle for another man like Mr. Harper, but they don't seem to be as plenty as we thought they'd be. If we did get one I suppose they'd want him to teach alongside of Mr. Harper in that new school where they're giving ideas about farming to the ministers they're sending out to the rural churches. It will take us considerable time to carry out all the ideas Mr. Harper left with us and by then you would know so much about farming you would be able to instruct us yourself.

"Say, you don't happen to remember what ration Ned Ransome feeds his hens, do you? Martha hain't had very good luck the past year and I told her I'd have to see what I could do. Just repeat that again. I never thought of hominy! What a memory you've got to reel off all that? Shows what education does. It does seem a pity for you to waste all you've learned here on Petersville, for they wouldn't listen to you a minute. Mebbe a young man like Mr. Harper could go down there and fight every inch of his way, or he could send one of the graduates of his school—it would be a fust-rate place to try one out. Now, here we're used to advice and kinder like it—farming or religious, either. That sermon you preached last Sunday was about the finest thing I ever listened to. Your sermons sound different, somehow, since we got acquainted. That's what I heard several of them say at a leetle meeting we had here last night. They asked me to tell you they'd jest naturally got over wanting a change. But, of course, if you're set on going to Petersville—"

"Oh, I could live here—always," said Eunice Clark at the close of the story her husband told her on the woodbine-shaded porch of "Our Home."

"You shall," the man promised her. "I think it will be—easy for me to stay here now, for I am determined to work as I have never worked before. Oh Eunice, I received the most helpful, the most unique, idea for a sermon from Deacon Holway's cornfield today!"

"And without a parable spake He not unto them," his wife quoted softly.

The Progressive Bible Class of Today

"THE old order changeth." It is a far cry from the adult Bible class in the Sunday school of thirty or forty years ago to the organized le class of today. Nothing that has come into the day school in the last quarter of a century has ed so much to its strength as the Organized ult Bible Class Movement.

t has added tens of thousands of men and women the Sunday school and provided them with many ms of Christian activity "between Sundays" as l as on the Lord's Day. It has kept hundreds of s and girls from "dropping out" of the Sunday ool when the boys had reached the "long pants" razor age and the girls had begun to "do up their r." These young people have been willing to stay the Sunday school having almost as many "grown s" as children in it.

There are adult classes in our country having more n a thousand members, and the class of two or ee hundred members is so common as to attract le attention.

They have put the Sunday school on a new basis have done much to bring into existence hundreds Sunday school buildings as a part of the regular ipment of the Church.

A conspicuous example of this is found in the fact that the First Christian Church Sunday School of Long Beach, Calif., is to have a Sunday school plant to cost $150,000. The main floor will nearly all be needed by the adult department of the school.

An inspiring example of the men's Bible class of today engaged in practical work is found in the Vanguard Class of the First Presbyterian Sunday school of Raleigh, N. C. In the year 1892 six young boys graduating from Mrs. Bauman's primary department were put under the leadership of Mr. Ed Crow, who had himself graduated a few years before; and at the death of his mother in 1895 her class of six boys was added to his, making twelve in all. In 1904 these boys who had reached young manhood decided that they could do a larger and better work for their Master and his church by making their class an organization. At the suggestion of Dr. A. H. Moment, then pastor of the church, the name of Vanguard was chosen. The class at once began to take a leading part in all the work of the church and Sunday school.

More than 1,000 young men have been on the roll, and today you can find a Vanguard in almost every state in the Union, and some in other lands.

One important work of the class has been the building of a neat little chapel in the outskirts of Raleigh for increased Presbyterian church and Sunday school work. One of the members of the class gave the ground and the class did the rest. At last reports the Sunday school held in it had a membership of ninety-six, with the certainty of larger growth. Preaching services under the direction of the class are held monthly.

The class had a membership of 221 last year.

To all their other good work the class has added that of a room in the Rex Hospital, and there is a regular Hospital Committee of the class to look after this room and its occupant as well as the patients in the wards of the hospital. Calling upon the sick is a duty never omitted. The class motto is "Always Ready," and the pastor of the church bears testimony to the fact that the class is always ready to do any work it is asked to do. The class text is "Be thou strong, therefore, and show thyself a man," while the class aim is given as "All present on time, Bible in hand; a liberal contribution, a well-studied lesson, a mind to learn."

Here we have a good illustration of the possibilities of service awaiting any well-organized and dead-in-earnest O. A. B. C. The Vanguards of Raleigh have set a high standard, and are living up to it to the help of the church and Sunday school and to the certain glory of God.

Power From on High

A SERMON BY REV. A. C. DIXON, D.D.*

TEXT—Ps. 46 : 1, 2. "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble: therefore will we not fear."

WHILE we are rejoicing in the victory which God has given to the cause of liberty and humanity in the world, it is fitting that we should rejoice in the victories he gives to the Christian, to the Church and to the Kingdom. The word "Selah" is usually omitted in reading the Psalms. Some Bible scholars think it is a mere musical pause, but I like the translation of Archibald Brown—"Think of that." Pause and think of what you have just read. And in this forty-sixth Psalm there are three "Selahs," each one marking a clear-cut division. The first three verses, down to the first "Selah," deal with personal victory. The next four verses, down to the second "Selah," refer to corporate or Church victory; and the last four verses, down to the third "Selah," deal with universal or Kingdom victory. Through personal victory comes Church victory; through Church victory in fulfilling her mission, "to take out a people for his name," universal victory, in God's good time, will come.

We have Victory over things that pursue. "God is our refuge." The man-slayer, pursued by the avenger of blood, runs into the city of refuge, and the moment he enters the gate, he is victorious over the pursuer who would take his life. He has triumphed by flight, for such was God's provision. A man in Scotland wrote me: "Forty years ago I committed an awful sin, and it has pursued me ever since. What shall I do?" I did not hesitate a moment for a reply. "Flee for refuge to God in Christ, and the moment you take shelter under the atoning blood, that moment you are victorious over all pursuing guilt." "There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus."

Charles Wesley was sitting by an open window, when a little sparrow, pursued by a hawk, came fluttering through and nestled in his bosom. The hawk dared not follow; and thus the sparrow gained a victory over the hawk by flight to a friendly heart and hand. It was this incident which Wesley had in mind when he wrote,

> "Jesus, refuge of my soul,
> Let me to thy bosom fly."

And any sinner, chased by the hawk of guilt, is more "than conqueror through Him that loved us" when he flees for refuge to the bosom of Christ. The omnipotent Hand protects him from the hawk of guilt that would capture and destroy.

Our follies, mistakes and blunders, as well as our sins, often pursue us through life, discouraging, weakening and defeating us. But there is victory over them if we are willing to take refuge in Christ. "God is our refuge," and when we flee to him we have the victory over everything that pursues.

WE HAVE victory over things that weaken. "God is our refuge and strength." After we have been saved from sin by taking refuge in Christ, we need to be saved from weakness by taking refuge in God the Holy Spirit. Just as we come to Christ for salvation, we may now come to the Holy Spirit for power. Our Lord Jesus said to some saved men, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high." There is a power from behind in a good prestige; there is a power from before in the thrill of hope; there is a power about us made up of good influences, social, financial and religious. But power from behind, from before and about us is a sort of power on the level, and is not sufficient for the needs of the Church. "The hand of the Lord was upon me," said the prophet, "and carried me out and set me down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones," and without this touch of God from on high we are helpless in the presence of bones, which can be raised to life only by the power of God. Down by the river in the gorge at Niagara Falls is a power-house, from which go out for many miles wires which carry electric currents for lighting, heating and propelling. I hear that Toronto, Canada, is heated and lighted by Niagara Falls, and the trolley cars along the way are propelled by Niagara Falls. The sanitarium can get the tonic touch of its electric baths and the electric chair its thunderbolt of death from Niagara Falls. The secret of it all is in the fact that the power-house by the river in the gorge is 167 feet below the top of the Falls. It gets its power from on high. And if the river were lifted to the level of the top of the Falls, there would be no power—only a dead level of weakness. One cause of our spiritual weakness today is that we have been lifting man up to a level with God. We talk of "the divinity of humanity." And as a result, there is no "power from on high." When we humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, taking our place of utter dependence on him, the power comes.

This power, however, shows itself in the quiet even more than in the rush and roar of Niagara. "Be still and know that I am God." God is not in the earthquake, the storm or the conflagration, but "in the still small voice." One Spring day I found myself near Niagara Falls in an orchard surrounded by blooming apple trees, and I remembered what I had read in a scientific book, namely, that there goes up in the sap of the trees of this earth every twenty-four hours more water than pours over Niagara Falls in a year. I do not vouch for the truth of this statement; but is is probably true. And if so, it is more wonderful than Niagara Falls. Think of a subtle, invisible power in nature, which can overcome the law of gravitation and lift in the sap of trees 365 Niagara Falls every twenty-four hours, turning it at the same time into fiber and bud and leaf and flower and fruit. That is the real wonder which God performs in grace as well as nature. He has his Niagaras of history, his rushing torrents of revival, that attract the attention of the ages; but the quiet constant work of the Holy Spirit lifting the water of life into millions of lives, forming fiber of character, bursting into bud and blossom of Christian graces and bearing fruit every day to the glory of God—that is the wonder of wonders. God is our strength for daily living as well as for great emergencies. We need "power from on high" for routine work and drudgery as much as for the great occasions of sermon and address.

WE HAVE victory over the things that trouble. "A very present help in trouble." God did not quench the fire of the furnace but the violence of it. He did not slay the lions, but left them alive and protected Daniel from them. So he does not always keep his people from trouble but helps them in it. "A very present help in trouble." Paul prayed that his trouble, the "thorn in the flesh," might be removed, and God answered the prayer by saying: "My grace is sufficient for thee." "It is better for you, Paul, to have your trouble, while I give you grace to bear it, than that I should remove it, so that you will need no grace."

Two friends of mine were redeemed drunkards. One of them declared that from the moment of his conversion, the taste for alcohol had been removed and he could do business in saloons without the slightest inclination to drink. The other said, "Not a day has passed since my conversion that I have not wanted a drink; but God has kept me from yielding." The man whose taste for drink was gone declared that God had complimented his friend by leaving in him the thirst for drink, and giving him grace to overcome it. But God could not trust him with an appetite, for he knew that he would be drunk before night. So God has various methods of giving victory to his children. In one case he may remove the temptation; in the other he may leave the temptation and give grace to overcome it. But in either case, victory is certain to him who has accepted God in Christ as his refuge and strength. He is "a present help in trouble." God himself is our help. He is today "Immanuel, God with us." No night is so dark that he does not go through it with us.

WE HAVE victory over things that threaten. "Therefore will we not fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea." During the terrible air raids in London the people crowded the lecture room of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, because, with its half-story underground, its sand-bagged windows, its thick granite walls and its three stories of concrete floors above it, the London County Council had advertised it as a comparatively safe place. Many a time I read and expounded this forty-sixth Psalm to the people who had fled there for refuge. And this verse quieted their nerves when the bombs were falling and the shrapnel shells exploding: "Therefore"—because God is our refuge and strength and a present help in trouble—"we will not fear, though the earth," which represents all terrestrial foundations, political, social, financial, governmental and ecclesiastical, "be removed"; and "though the mountains," which represent the high places of the earth, political, s financial, governmental and ecclesiastical—t which seem to be solid and permanent—"be ca into the midst of the sea"; though the solid an permanent be swallowed up in the mobile, tumult and revolutionary, "we will not fear."

During this war, the earth has been remo Institutions that seemed solid and permanent been destroyed. And the high places of eartl thrones, crowns and kingdoms, have been cast the seething ocean of revolution. And now come aftermath of roaring, troubled waters, the resu these revolutions. Yet "God reigns and we wil fear." With him as our refuge, strength and pr help in trouble, we shall be victorious over everyt however terrible, that threatens.

WE HAVE victory over the things that hi "There is a river, the streams whereof r glad the city of God." The two little words, "T is," are in italics, and ought to be omitted. (who gives us victory over the things that pu weaken, trouble and threaten, is himself "a r the streams whereof make glad the city of G The word "streams" mean in the Hebrew "irriga canals"; and I learned what this meant while trav one day through an Arizona desert. Looking thr the train window, I saw only sand, sagebrush cactus, a scene of desolation, when suddenly passed into a garden of beauty, with its orange t olives, pomegranates, grapes and flowers. Irriga had made the change. Up in the mountains, seve five miles away, the government had built at g expense the Roosevelt dam, which held in a g pond the rains and snows of winter; and from dam was a great canal through the desert, from w went out small canals and smaller still, until the of every tree and every blade of grass felt the giving touch of these waters. Our victorious Go the river from whose thought and purpose and and wisdom and power flow the irrigation canal blessing through the desert earth. The Bible is an irrigation canal, watering the ages. The Chu is another, the foreign mission movement anot the Sunday school movement another, the Pro tion movement another. All movements, little large, for the blessing of mankind come from loving heart of God, and through them he pours resources of power, wisdom, love and life.

But God does not trust the movements. He g with them and by his own supernatural touch g victory over all things that hinder. "The cit God," made glad by these streams, is a spiri municipality, spreading out into all sorts of organ efforts and will have his personal presence. "Go in the midst of her; she shall not be moved. (shall help her, and that right early." The g world movements and the little community mo ments which God has initiated and is carrying forw will have his personal attention. He will see t they are supplied with water through the irrigat canals he has constructed and filled. "God shall h her," and give victory over everything that hinders.

WE HAVE victory over the things that destr "Come, behold the works of the Lord, w desolations he hath made in the earth." God i desolator, and he takes all responsibility for desolations he makes. He invites attention to th He wants everybody to see them. "Come, behol But note carefully the kind of desolations he mak "He makes wars to cease unto the end of the eart He desolates wars, and everything else that desola He destroys the things that destroy. "He break the bow." He cutteth in pieces the things that c "He cutteth the spear in sunder." "He burneth chariot in the fire." God desolates desolations a he will continue to do so until all destroyers shall destroyed. Certainly this will be done, when the o One who is great enough to be head of the League Nations, the King of kings, shall appear, and set his Kingdom democracy, his saints ruling with hi on this earth. Then the implements of desolati which are not destroyed shall be transmuted i implements of increase in peace. "They shall be their swords into plowshares and their spears i pruning-hooks." And while we await that glad d let us be "workers together with him" in destroyi all things that destroy.

The final victory over all things that pursue, wea en, trouble, threaten, hinder and destroy is assur to those who take refuge in God through Jesus Chr our Lord.

he Witness of the New Life

UNDAY. Ps. 40 : 3. "He put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God." Is it possible to arrange a series of metaphors expressive of a life which has been ed by the Lord from the sin and ry of spiritual alienation into the ancy and glory of spiritual freedom? The figures of speech just race one another in breathless eagerness to describe the wonders of deliverance. Picture follows picture, and every adds a new element of wonder. The m was in a horrible pit, the deep e of a peopled darkness, full of all s of ugly and frightful shapes. Then pit had the added horror of miry . The victim was sinking into more l necessity; he had no firm standing. And the Lord lifted him clean out his gruesome bondage. He found self in the light, with a steadfast e of assurance that he had gained ew standing. From miry clay to k! But the delivered life was not ionary. It was full of movement progress. The Lord gave him power tep out on a new road. "He established my goings." And as if the emantion was not even yet sufficiently ntiful, the new road became the e of music. "He put a new song in mouth." Shall we say that this ored clock has musical chimes? s released bird has found a new song? is soul has made the splendid exchange of mourning for the oil of joy, the garment of praise for the spirit heaviness.

But I have not yet disclosed what I h to be most prominent in this meditation. After describing his deliverance, the psalmist goes on to say: Many shall see and shall fear, and ll trust in the Lord." He was once bondman and has become a noble usader, and he goes singing along his y. You cannot hide that man. He ist be heard and seen. He need not ve a pulpit and be a preacher or a blic herald. His witness is of a more al order, for it is the arresting witness of a transformed and transfigured . This is not a miracle which is read out; this is a miracle which is walking about and very ordinary folk can see and be impressed by its significance. e miry clay has been left behind. e pit is now a gloomy memory. The n is a knight of the Lord, and as he ides along in clean shining armor d with a heart that is full of praise, hers are quickened by the vital witness.

It is this kind of witness which is the rald of larger triumphs. "They came at they might see Lazarus whom he d raised from the dead." They came curiosity; they stayed in reverence; ey knelt in surrender and prayer. The iracle that happened to one knight ew others into the fellowship of Christ.

Concerning Sorrows

ONDAY. Isa. 51 : 11. "Sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Abraam Lincoln said that the pond lily was is favorite flower, because it came up t of great tribulation, and wore its lorious robes modestly. Every home ught to have a water lily in the yard r in the window garden. It is a friend, sermon, a comfort, an exposition of e ways of the Lord, and a suggestion f heaven.

Look at it with a reading-glass, and then realize how its sorrows were really worth while. The startling but helpful contrast between the root and the blossom contains a whole volume of sweet comfort for the broken-hearted. The silhouetted forms seen in the dark shadows on the curtain are but phantom images of real forms walking in the bright light. Sorrows are shadows, which the angels presented on life's screen, showing clearly the truth that the shadows of gloom have a glorious counterpart, and a real one, in the light of heaven's shining gates.

Nothing brings the Eternal City so clearly to view as the shadows of earth's farewells, the funerals, and the lonely homes. The comforting touch of a sympathetic hand and the whisper of love to a stricken soul could not be appreciated without grief.

How thrilling and joyful the thoughts which come to the stricken soul when it hears sung the words of Paul concerning our Lord, "who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the Cross, despising the shame!" What dark form is that outlined so clearly on death's impenetrable veil? Jesus of Nazareth passeth by!

The Message to the Churches

TUESDAY. Rev. 3 : 22. "What the Spirit saith unto the churches." Amid the cross-currents of the apostolic time, unity was maintained. At Corinth Paul might have to defend the resurrection. To the elect body John might have to suggest that persons who wilfully deny the Christ cannot expect Christian hospitality. Timothy might be warned with fearful emphasis against seducing spirits, and Jude would denounce the ungodly who crept in unawares. But however perilous the times, the freedom of the Gospel was preferred to an external uniformity. The only discipline was the constraining love of Christ, and it was sufficient. What they valued was "the glorious liberty of the children of God"—the liberty which is itself a law, as in a family, where the tie is affection.

The Body of Christ was one; he alone was the Head, and the rest were members one of another. Some were like hands or feet, or even humbler organs of sense, but all were necessary, all were honorable, and a wound inflicted on one of them hurt the whole community. And so it was with the communities of saints. The churches of Asia were seven, For each there was an angel or messenger, bright and kindling as a star held eternally in the hand of God. Each church had done its own works, faced its own problems, recorded its own successes or failures, and the ear of each was invited, severally, for an individual warning or encouragement. But amid this solemn variety of vision, there rose a Voice that spoke as one, the Eye that saw as one, and the sevenfold Spirit. There rose, solitary and tremendous, what may be called the personality of Jehovah—the Great I Am—ordaining his own rewards for him who overcomes.

The Radiance of the Cross

WEDNESDAY. Gal. 6 : 14. "Far be it from me to glory, save in the Cross." There is a definite plan in God's dealings with us. There are no happenings in our lives. Trouble springeth not up out of the ground. Our Father stands "within the shadow, keeping watch above his own." He sitteth as a refiner of silver, watching the fires lest they burn too fiercely, and watching the silver until it reflects his face.

All our life-lines radiate from the Cross. God is love. You may not see it, my friend; the Cross may be nothing to you. But if you are not saved, if you do not enter into the fullness of that great salvation which is ready to be revealed in the last time, it will not be because God has not done his best and utmost for you. The Cross is in evidence. Its luminous shadow is over you; and failure of attaining to the best and noblest is possible only to those who wilfully and fatuously turn their backs upon it.

Then we begin to learn that all the lines of Providence converge toward a throne; a throne for two occupants, namely, Christ and the Christian. For so it is written: "To him that overcometh will I give to sit together with me in my throne." This means character, and manhood, and usefulness, and all that is finest, and noblest, and divinest in life. To this end God is ruling and overruling in our affairs.

Face to Face With God

THURSDAY. II Cor. 4 : 6. "To give the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." A nurse in the Civil War was suddenly called upon to pray for the soul of a soldier who was lying in the gutter by the roadside. The nurse was not an open follower of Jesus and had never prayed before others. She said afterward: "When I knelt, I realized that I was face to face with God. I had to receive him or reject him. As I poured out my heart in prayer for the soldier, my own heart was filled with his presence." Is not every soul called upon to make this final decision, and when Christ is rejected for the last time, it is then that the Holy Spirit takes His flight.

Samuel Hopkins Hadley had this final vision of the Christ while sitting on a whisky barrel in a saloon. He said: "I got a view of eternity that night in that gin-mill. I saw what I believe every poor sinner will see when he stands unrepentant, unforgiven before the bar of God. I thought I was dying. My sins appeared to creep along the wall in letters of fire, like the writing on the wall in Belshazzar's palace. I thought of the old text of my boyhood, 'Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' I was too drunk to pray intelligently. I had heard that if one would only look to Jesus, he would take that look for a prayer. All of a sudden, I seemed to feel a great and mighty Presence, and, realizing that I was falling, I said, 'I will fall toward the Cross.' "

On the following Sunday evening, in McAuley's Mission, Hadley was present. When he cried, "Jesus, won't you help me?" then the brightness, like noonday, shone into his heart. It is said that seventy-five thousand persons sought and found the new life during the twenty years that Hadley conducted the Water Street Mission. This may have been Hadley's last chance; he was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. He yielded, lived an honored, useful life, and brought many to the Kingdom.

Spiritual Gravitation

FRIDAY. Acts 4 : 23. "And being let go, they went to their own company." The old story of Circe, who welcomed her guests at the front gate of her garden, entertaining them with all manner of sensual delights, and after transforming them into unclean beasts, let them out at her back gate into a region of darkness, is no fable. Multitudes go out of life that way.

The light of heaven is for those who walk as children of light, while the outer darkness is for those who would be at home nowhere else. It is written of Judas that he "went to his own place." Where else could he go? And once there, what possible hope would there be of such a moral transformation as would fit him for anywhere else?

Who then shall ascend into the hill of the Lord, or who shall stand in his holy place? "He that hath clean hands and a pure heart," whose sins have been blotted out by the atoning blood and whose character has been built up after the likeness of the Ideal Man. "He shall receive the blessing of the Lord and righteousness from the God of his salvation." The way is provided, the royal way of the Cross, where all who will may journey in the fellowship of those who come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads.

"Blessed be God!" said Dr. Preston, when he stood at the last crossing. "I am changing my place, but not my company. I have loved the fellowship of God's people on earth and I shall be happy with them forever."

God help us so to live in this present world that when we come in sight of the Celestial City we may be thus prepared and disposed to enter in.

The Searcher of Hearts

SATURDAY. I John 3 : 20. "For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things." Conscience is the voice of God in the soul. Rain warns of disease, that the remedy may be applied. So remorse speaks of the sinsick soul. If there is no relief from condemnation, life becomes unbearable. But when the accusing conscience rests upon the bosom of forgiveness, condemnation is gone. Then have we confidence toward God.

Peter realized that Jesus saw into the depths of his being when he replied, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." He was conscious that Christ knew of his penitence, his deep contrition, returning love, and longing for restoration. Others may misjudge you, cast you out as evil, but he knows all the facts; he remembereth that we are dust; he responds to our longing love with oceans of compassion, he takes us to his heart because he understands all our struggles, woes and conflicts.

He who knows that we love him is infinitely greater than all the knowledge of fellow men which may condemn us. His omniscient eye looks upon us in love and whispers, "Peace be unto thee; rest in me; feed my lambs." No one else can forgive and save like the wonderful Saviour. All others may have opinions, imaginings, guesses, but only One knows. How unsearchable are his judgments, his mercy and compassion! When his love flows back into the heart that has denied him, we know that we have passed from death unto life, from sin unto holiness, from hell to heaven.

THE PRESIDENT'S TOUR

IT IS a big task for any one to undertake to deliver thirty addresses before audiences in different states in a single month. This is what is contemplated in the President's country-wide appeal in behalf of the League of Nations and the Peace Treaty. There will be addresses in halls, and possibly outdoors, and, of course, he will occasionally speak from the car platform; for during the whole trip he will, in a very large degree, be a habitant of the train.

As he will meet many different audiences during his tour, his speeches will be varied according to the needs of the occasion, and it is more than likely that he will take up questions now before Congress other than those related to the League. Mr. Wilson is a facile speaker and usually has little difficulty in finding his way to the sympathies of his audience; yet the task he has set himself is one of the most strenuous and exacting he could have chosen.

Other Presidents in the past have made the "Swing around the Circle." Andrew Johnson did it over fifty-three years ago and in a limited degree, Presidents Grant, Harrison and Taft made the experiment. McKinley and Roosevelt never essayed the swing. It has its merits, however, as well as its disadvantages; and if in the present instance it tends to harmony on the great issues now before the nation, it will not have been wasted effort.

President Wilson begins his tour with the best wishes of our people that it will result in helping clear up the political atmosphere. Wherever he speaks he will be assured of a hearty welcome and a patient hearing.

SOLDIERS OF THE CROSS

NEWS comes that Alvin C. York, the mountaineer hero of the war, has decided to devote his life to missionary and uplift work among the people of the hills where he was born. Had he been eager for wealth, he might easily have made it out of the fame he had won, and with it a life of ease and pleasure. But the war had pierced his soul and awakened new impulses. He felt that he was called to a higher career than being exploited as a marvel of courage and an unerring marksman. Thoughtful and conscientious even before his military experience, he chose rather to be a soldier of the Cross, so that he might bring men to make the same surrender he himself had made, when, long years ago, he put his whole life in God's keeping.

These hardy mountaineers among whom his lot is cast will rejoice at the step he has taken. They honor a brave and fearless man, and when such a one comes among them they gladly follow where he leads. They can recall other soldiers of the Cross who, having laid aside forever the weapons of war, came among them to fight the good fight that wins souls. Oliver Otis Howard, whose memory they revere and who founded a great work especially for the mountaineers, was their typical soldier of the Cross. Colonel Guerrant, organizer of the Soul-Winners and founder of churches, schools and log colleges, was another whose self-denying work brought blessing to the dwellers in those rugged hills and deep glens.

There are those who may call Alvin C. York foolish to have flung away the brilliant opportunities that lay within his reach; but all thoughtful minds must honor him for his unselfish sacrifice and his fine decision.

PASTORS' SALARIES

IN THESE days of high cost of living, attention is being called—and we think deservedly—to the meager salaries that are paid to thousands of ministers of the Gospel throughout the country, and which have remained unchanged, while all other callings have benefited by a necessary increase.

Here is a little illustration, which is fairly representative of conditions in thousands of small communities: A committee in Pennsylvania representing some twenty congregations, apparently stricken with a sense of duty too long delayed, in appealing to their congregations to raise the pastors' salaries, calls attention to the fact that Bradstreet's statistics show that in 1914, $437 would buy as much of the necessaries of life as $1,000 would do at the present time; $650 then was equivalent to $1,500 today; $1,000 then equaled $2,290 now; $1,500 then (and few rural ministers got as high a figure) equaled in present purchasing power $3,435. In other words, the figures are more than doubled, and give a fair indication of the increase in the cost of living.

Here is something for our rural churches to ponder, for in the great majority of cases the minister and his income have not been considered. He may be able to scratch along by making his little garden and by wearing old clothes and denying his family and himself anything but the barest necessaries. Yet, in spite of these depressing conditions, he does his duty, comforts and leads his flock, visits the sick, and acts as a faithful spiritual shepherd, although he has the consciousness that the situation is wrong and utterly unjust.

Look after your pastor. Don't let him suffer. Don't let it be said that even the common laborer gets more for his work than the man who has the souls of the whole parish in his keeping. The laborer is worthy of his hire. And so, too, is the dominie.

BOLSHEVIST TEACHING

IN A recent issue the "American Lumberman" of Chicago discusses the spread of Bolshevism, "not among the foreign element, but among our own sons and daughters." It has learned that there are on the faculties of some of our colleges and universities professors "whose deliberate purpose it is to bring about in the United States conditions such as today obtain in Russia," and that in some cases they are there "with the full knowledge and approval of the college authorities." This last assertion would seem fairly borne out by the evidence the "Lumberman" presents relative to an institution in Indiana enrolling 800 students. Several of the instructors, it states, make no secret of their sympathy with Bolshevist doctrines, and the head of the institution seems to have been more than favorable to their attachment to the teaching faculty, although fully informed of their revolutionary tendencies.

While our government is busy counteracting Bolshevism in the slums, it should turn its attention to those colleges where American youth are being led, by subtle methods, to the adoption of radical principles which may be fraught with danger in the future. We have the fashionable parlor Bolshevist, the adroit Bolshevist in literature, and the vulgar Bolshevist, whose methods bring him more quickly into contact with the authorities than the others; but it is a new experience to be assured that there are in American colleges, which have hitherto stood well in the esteem of the people, those who seek to indoctrinate the students with the vagaries of Marx and Lenine instead of pointing them to the high ideals of the great minds which founded this republic and gave to the nation a charter of freedom which has become a model for the world. How would the generous patrons of education who have given millions to found and establish our colleges regard such institutions now, if they could know the facts that are coming to light? The "Lumberman" has done well in bringing this situation to the notice of the public. It is a case of poisoning the pure stream of education at the fountain-head.

WHY NOT CHECK THE TURK?

FROM several sources we hear grim forebodings of an impending tragedy in Armenia. While the Allies are discussing Hungary's troubles, Russia's need of help, and the new disturbances in the Balkans, cable and mail correspondence both picture conditions in the Near East as tending toward an attempt by Turkey to carry out on a large scale the plan she has long cherished for the extermination of the Armenians. Her purpose was temporarily balked a year ago, but has now been taken up again with deadly earnestness. Our generous-hearted people in America have been endeavoring, on purely benevolent grounds, to save the Armenians from perishing of starvation. They have spared no efforts toward this end, and they have succeeded in saving many thousands of lives.

Now that Allied troops have been largely withdrawn from Asia Minor, Enver Pasha, author of many atrocities, is reported to have an army of 100,000 men ready to take advantage of the opportunity to move against the undefended Armenians, and to add to the hideous history of Turkey's crimes the bloodiest page of all. The Turks are even menacing the missionaries who have been carrying on a Christlike work amid many perils. They are accused of plotting against Ottoman authority. This baseless charge, like all the rest of Turkey's averments relative to Armenia, is merely a subterfuge. In 1896 our missionaries saved the Armenians from massacre and starvation, at a time when Turkey was shocking the civilized world by her determined efforts to exterminate the native Christian population of Anatolia. Now, no adequate protection will be afforded to the hundreds of thousands of pitiful refugees, who have been robbed of all their worldly possession driven from their homes to the borders of M tamia to Syria, and even to Palestine.

The plan to deal a final crushing blow t Armenians, once set in motion, could hardly be in time to prevent a catastrophe. What are the going to do about it? What is the American Co going to do to prevent it? In the great sche world pacification and readjustment, surely thing can be done to save the Armenians and store to them the possession of their ancient lar

A POPULATION SURVEY

ALTHOUGH it is yet a little too early fo liable prognostications on the 1920 ce surveys are being made which give a p fair idea of the growth of our country as a whole the census of 1910 was taken. These surveys included all the large cities of over 25,000 popul New York, which had a population of 4,760,000 years ago, now has 6,244,000. Chicago comes with 3,059,000, or nearly a million more than a last official "numbering of the people." Phil phia is a fair third, with 1,936,000—a gain of 400,000 in the same period. Then follow, in order given: Cleveland with 936,000; Detroit, 000; Boston, 830,000; St. Louis, 824,000; Balti 726,000; Pittsburg, 667,000; Los Angeles, 574 San Francisco, 555,000; Buffalo, 516,000; Mil kee, 504,000; Cincinnati, 472,000; New Orl 440,000; Washington, 430,000; so on down the

Some interesting features are disclosed by the official survey. New York, which in the 1910 c had 2,000 more women than men, now has 2,500 feminine majority. The big metropolis has gr increased its lead over Chicago in these nine y while Boston has gone back to sixth place. Angeles has outstripped San Francisco, both c however, having nearly doubled their former year increase. In New York there are 1,079,000 dren in school. The ratio of illiterates has dro considerably. Another sign of our progressive t is found in the fact that the big city now consu 102,000,000 gallons of water daily more than it ten years ago, which some may regard as confirma evidence that New York is fairly on the water wa

Does Insurance Insure You?

Many Policies Invalidated by Carelessness of the Insured

By HARRY BOTSFORD

THE fire loss in the United States last year has been carefully estimated at $2.76 per capita and the losses from fire in the United States and Canada in the last forty years has been $6,672,966,045. This foots up to a staggering sum and a great industrial loss, whether the loss was footed by fire insurance companies or owners.

ROM my experience as owner and manager of a fire insurance agency it is natural for me to late on what proportion at loss has been suffered ners of the property, even h they were technically ed by a fire insurance y. No statistics have ever prepared on this matter, figures could be presented they would astonish their magnitude.

ery agent selling fire insurance can testify that usual home-owner who insures his property st loss by hazard of fire will violate the conditions e policy many times during the life of the policy. porated in the body of every fire insurance policy number of vitally interesting fine print clauses ing certain specific violations which will annul olicy in case of fire.

surance policies are standardized, and each policy he selfsame clauses that are placed there for the ual protection of the fire insurance companies and nsured. They protect the underwriter, because ery person carrying a policy heeds the injunctions ire hazard is greatly reduced.

e whole truth is that the average person never s his policy, and if he has a fire and tells the h when the adjuster comes around he may face nusual loss and suffer financially simply because d not read and heed the fine print clauses. Many e insurance agent has had a bad half hour with ts as a direct result of this condition.

THE first place your policy is void if you misrepresent or conceal, in writing or otherwise, any erial fact or circumstance concerning your insur- or the subject thereof. This simple clause rs a wide scope of territory, and it behooves every y holder to go over his policy carefully and note discrepancies that occur. I can remember one icular case where the street number was changed 345 to 435, and when a fire loss occurred the pany pointed out that their policy covered a rent location than that upon which the fire rred. The fault in this case was hard to place, might have been either the agent's or the house er's.

your property is mortgaged, be sure and state it he agent who writes your policy, as the terms of policy are very definite in regard to this, and fail- to state such a condition will prove a violation in of fire. In other words (to cover a series of ses), if interest of owner be other than sole and nditional owner, state the facts in your applica-. Or should any condition come up during the of the policy that would change the situation, it ise to inform the writing agent at once.

you sell your property or dispose of it, urge the er to have a transfer made of the policy at once, the minute that the property changes hands the icy becomes void. To be definite, any change in ership, other than the death of the insured, sufficient grounds for a violation of the terms he policy, and will cause it to be cancelled at e.

remember a wealthy real-estate owner who came me and gave me a number of policies covering own property and various houses owned by him. explained that the policies would expire within a nth or two and, as he intended being absent, he ired me to look after the renewals. I made an in tigation and discovered that if a fire had occurred would have lost the exact value of every property owned and supposed covered by his policies! The ation was very unusual and is worth explaining in ail because it indicates the danger of increasing r fire hazard at the expense of a violation of your icy.

found one house being prepared for repainting, the painters were burning off the paint, which very dangerous practice, and is cause for violation any fire insurance policy. There are a very few npanies that will issue a permit for work of this ture, but the majority of them will refuse to do so, it is a poor underwriting policy.

T ANOTHER dwelling I found a force of carpenters and plumbers at work, and inquiry veloped the fact that they had been working at is place in excess of fifteen days. Another violation, the fire hazard is greatly increased by such work, the possibility of a fire is increased in many ways. remedied this situation by securing a permit on a gular form and attaching it to the policy and forrding the other to the company writing the policy. Every insurance company is liberal in this matter and will always grant a permit to cover the case, which will protect the insured in case of loss by fire.

Two other houses were vacant and had been so for a period of over ten days, and this constituted another violation, and, as in the other case, was remedied by the permit, issued and approved by the writing company.

The real-estate owners' own home was not occupied, as he was away for the summer, and owing to a certain clause this became a violation which could only be corrected by the proper permit. This covered the whole list of violations in his particular case, and the unusual situation was due entirely to his ignorance of the fire insurance contract.

THERE are a number of other causes that contribute to make the fire insurance agent and the fire insurance adjuster prematurely gray, and disturb their peace of mind, and often help disturb the faith of the public in the great fire insurance companies.

For example: your fire insurance policy definitely states you must not keep or store gasoline, benzine, or naphtha in your house, and yet practically every housewife keeps a bottle of this dangerous fluid for cleaning purposes. Its use is exceedingly dangerous and is responsible for a large annual fire loss. Also if your property is burned as a result of a riot or of your own carelessness, your loss will never be paid.

If your neighbor generates gas from oils, gasoline or any other matter for illuminating purposes, and as a direct and resulting cause your property is burned, you will find that you are not covered against loss by your policy. This is one case where it will pay you to know what your neighbor is doing!

In case you have a fire, the adjuster will call and ask for a list of your goods and the prices you paid for them. If you try to recall every item in your house, as you would in case of complete loss, you would inevitably leave out some article or articles that would mean a direct loss to you. The best advice is to keep a household inventory in your safe deposit vault where you should keep your Liberty Bonds and deeds and stocks, as none of these are covered by your policy or any insurance policy issued. This inventory can be kept up to date and can be accurate in every detail as to the original price paid for any article. When your loss occurs and the fire adjuster calls and you are in a position to show such an inventory, you will find that he will appreciate it very much, and it will facilitate an early payment of your claim. And be sure and answer carefully every question he asks, for it is only by doing this questioning that he is able to present a report to the company, and as this report always predates the payment of the claim, you can see the direct advantage of doing this and treating him in a courteous manner.

If the public covered by fire insurance policies will only read the fine print clauses, there will be less disputes on the matter of adjustments of losses; and there will be far less losses to adjust, if the public will only heed the injunctions outlined.

Our national fire loss is too high, and every individual can live up to the terms of his policy and reduce the loss to a large extent. At least living up to these terms is no hardship and should contribute greatly to the peace of mind.

TWO PERIODS OF FOOD PRICES

Comparison of Fluctuations Following the Civil War and Those Today

By FRANCIS A. COLLINS

WILL the history of high prices and their decline in Civil War times repeat itself under present conditions? More than half a century ago the country passed through a period of inflated values in many ways identical with the present situation. It is very interesting to watch how the prices of other days rose and afterward declined with surprising suddenness. A new light is thrown upon the problem of high prices and the relief we are hoping for. No question confronting the country today, it is safe to say, is the subject of such general and lively discussion.

A careful parallel has been worked out by comparing the prices of ninety-two commodities during Civil War times and at the present time. The curves showing the rise in prices during the two periods are surprisingly close together. To compare the periods the date of the opening of the Civil War is fixed, not with the firing on Fort Sumter, but with Lincoln's call for an extra session of Congress, July 28, 1861. The date selected for the opening of the world war is fixed in July 28, 1914, with Austria-Hungary's declaration of war upon Serbia. It will be seen that the two wars thus started in the same month, so that the seasonal factors remain common to both.

The rise in prices began earlier in the Civil War than in the recent conflict. There was a strong upward movement in almost all commodities throughout the first six months, whereas in the world war there was little change until toward the end of the first year of fighting. It is surprising to find that the Civil War prices were more extreme than those we are complaining of today. If we consider that both started at an arbitrary point called 100 a striking contrast is made possible. The Civil War prices reached 216, whereas the present war has only sent them up to 177, the high point being reached in January, 1918.

The Civil War prices rose at the end of the war to an unprecedented point and then as suddenly declined. The fall in prices followed immediately upon Lee's surrender to Grant. No similar drop followed the surrender of the German armies. It is surprising to find that the movement of prices during the two great wars should have followed one another so closely for several years, although the conditions were very different. It should be remembered that the great factor in controlling Civil War prices was the fluctuation of gold. The prices of foods followed the movement of the gold.

During the Civil War, again, high prices were confined almost wholly to America. Throughout the period the prices in England, France and Germany did not rise more than from six to ten per cent. above the normal. In the recent war monetary changes have had little effect upon prices. Although bond issues totaling billions were raised repeatedly, the prices of commodities showed little or no reaction at the time. The impetus to higher price level came almost wholly from abroad.

In looking back over the fateful years from 1914 to the present time it is clear that high prices were due much more to the interruption of supplies and the changes in demand than during Civil War times. At that time the United States was the only great nation at war, and when peace came the flow of commodities from Europe, where conditions were normal, quickly lowered prices. Then again, the warring countries mobilized their forces for the great war as never before in history. The governments had to have supplies to carry on the war regardless of cost.

The high prices came to vex people much earlier in England and in France than in the United States. It was not until after April, 1917, that we suffered from the same conditions which had obtained in Europe for nearly three years.

In deciding whether the high prices will react, the changed conditions in America today as compared with Civil War times must be considered. In those days the West offered boundless grazing territory, which tended to keep the price of meat to low levels. The timber supply, besides, was thought to be limitless, and immense stores of lumber were cut at low prices. The West today is so populated that the grazing land is limited, and the forests are rapidly disappearing. The result is that the price of meat or of lumber, to take but two examples, is forced up by natural conditions and can never return to the original level.

The most important factor in the present situation is that the government is now taking a hand in the regulation of prices. In Civil War times we knew little about government regulation of foods such as has been practiced in the recent war.

President Wilson and Attorney-General Palmer conferred with Governors of seven states in an effort to establish a plan of cooperation between Nation and States for red ing the high cost of living. It is understood that the Governors are to take stringent means for tracing food hoarders. Front row: Governor Sproul, of Pennsylva Attorney-General Mitchel Palmer; President Wilson; Governor Gardiner, of Missouri; and Mr. Boyle, of Montana (extreme right). Back row, left to right: Brigadier-G eral Berry, of Pennsylvania; Governor Milliken, of Maine; Governor Cooper, of South Carolina; Governor Campbell, of Arizona; Attorney-General Gose, of Missouri; Reilly, Secretary of the Conference; Governor Burnquist, of Minnesota; Mr. Modevitt, Secretary of Governor Sproul; Lieutenant-Governor MacDowell, of Montana, and Scott, Secretary to Governor Burnquist

President Wilson Appeals to the Country

PRESIDENT WILSON is now on his long-delayed "Swing around the circle." In many respects it is probably the most momentous trip any President has made. He is asking the people of the United States to support without amendment or reservation the work of himself and his colleagues at the Peace Conference. He is asking the people to tell their representatives in the Senate that the Peace Treaty, as he brought it from Paris, is the document America wants as a binding foreign policy. His appeal is direct and forceful. Careful observers who are traveling with him and watching the effect of his addresses on his audiences are divided in their opinions. He has been greeted with much enthusiasm, but there is some doubt as to how much of this is generated by adherence to his ideas and how much to the presence of a President of the United States. The day before he left Washington, Mr. Wilson had a final conference with Senator Hitchcock, Administration leader in the Senate, and reiterated his determination to accept no amendments or reservations to the Treaty. The Republican majority, in a series of conferences, have been seeking an agreement on the extent of the changes they will insist on, but thus far the members are not wholly agreed. There is no chance of reporting the Treaty to the full Senate until the Foreign Relations Committee is assured of the character of the support its changes will command. Senator Johnson's amendment, which would provide six votes for the United States in the League of Nations, is supplanting Senator Lodge's Shantung amendment in general interest. The principal point on which the Republicans are splitting is on the reservation to Article X. The Lodge faction is asking for a reservation which would amount to the elimination of the article. The "mild" reservationists favor the article, but will insist on action by the United States in support of alien territorial integrity being dependent on action by Congress. The clauses relating to the Monroe Doctrine, internal affairs and withdrawal from the League of Nations are the subject of very little debate.

Administration leaders assert that the country is tired of Republican opposition to the Treaty and that the President's trip will show without question a universal demand for its immediate ratification. The opposition is firmly convinced that nothing the President can say will persuade the people that they should take the troubles of the world on their shoulders, and that the coast-to-coast tour will convince even the President of the necessity of some Treaty changes.

Trouble Along the Baltic

A BIG British squadron under command of Vice-Admiral Cowan has appeared in the Baltic Sea, and the commander is conferring with Allied military leaders on plans for a campaign against the Bolsheviki in the Petrograd region. The situation around Petrograd is causing considerable worry to the Allied powers, and the attitude of the German army under Field-Marshal von der Goltz in the Baltic Provinces is providing serious complications. The German government has ordered this force of occupation to return to Germany, and von der Goltz, apparently, has seconded the government's orders, but the army refuses to obey. Berlin has offered unsatisfactory explanations of this mutinous attitude, and there is danger that the Allied forces along the Baltic may be compelled to eject the Germans as well as undertake an offensive against the Bolsheviki. Lenine and Trotsky have offered peace to Esthonia, but on the other hand have threatened Finland with invasion by strong Red forces unless the anti-Bolshevist activities directed by the Helsingfors government are promptly ended.

In Eastern Russia the Bolshevists announce the evacuation of Omsk by the Kolchak government and the defeat of General Denikine in several engagements, together with the capture of quite a bit of territory in the southeast.

The Austrian Peace Treaty

THE Supreme Council has delivered to the Austrian delegation, and the Austrians have signed, a revised Treaty of Peace with slight concessions made as the result of Austrian counter-proposals, but in the main the document retains its original form. The signatures have been attached with some parts of the territorial clauses indefinite. Arrangements will be made to settle boundary questions later. This is particularly true of Fiume. Lloyd George, Clemenceau and Tittoni have prepared a communication which has been sent to Mr. Wilson outlining a compromise proposal for the settlement of the Adriatic problem which is said to satisfy Italian aspirations and at the same time meet with the President's demands. If Mr. Wilson agrees to the compromise, the long-discussed nationalization of Fiume will have materialized. Hungary, Italy, Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Germany all are interested in the final adjustment of the Austrian frontiers and all will get a slice of the old Austrian territory. Austria will gain some at the expense of Hungary, however, for a small German-speaking district has been detached from the Hungarian state and added to Austria.

The Question of Thrace

PRESIDENT WILSON has offered still another solution to the problem of the Balkans in the creation of a new state to be comprised of Constantinople, Eastern Thrace, and part of Western Thrace—the state to be under the control of the League of Nations. The President has consistently opposed the cession to Greece of Thracian territory, but his plans have been objected to by both England and France in support of Venizelos and the Grecian nationalists. It is the theory of the American delegation that hope of peace in the Balkans depends almost entirely on the treatment Bulgaria obtains from the Peace Conference. Rightly or not, the Americans have constituted themselves the defenders of the Bulgars and the opponents of the Greeks. It is probable Greece would consent to an arrangement whereby she could annex Eastern Thrace and Western Thrace could be internationalized, but this scheme presupposes the defeat of Bulgarian ambitions and the virtual cutting off from the sea of the Bulgarian people. The Peace Conference is hastening work on the treaty with the Bulg and this matter of territorial adju ment may be left for future settlem just as it has been in the case of A tria.

The Republic of Korea

OVER the signature of Dr. Syngm Rhee the world has been advi of the proclamation of "the republic Korea." Dr. Rhee, as president of t new republic, explains the characte ties of the republic's constitution, wh is modeled largely after that of t United States. It provides for a con tutional form of government—freed of speech and religion, universal s frage and a ministry responsible to elective parliament. The proclamati reviews the history of the country a bitterly assails the Japanese admin tration. Following almost immediat on the announcement, Koreans in Se attempted to assassinate the new appointed Japanese governor-gener Baron Saito. A bomb was thrown the Baron's carriage and several perso were wounded, including two America but the governor-general escaped u hurt. Advices to the State Departme say that the recent change in t Korean government has had the effe of stimulating the Korean revolutio It was the belief in Tokyo that the r establishment of civil control wou tend to restore order, but the necessi of appointing representatives of th military to the high posts in Seo defeated this hope.

The presidenti message met with a favorable reactio among responsible labor leaders. Som of the more radical representative however, disapproved of it and of th conference, their attitude being ind cated by James P. Holland, president the New York State Federation Labor. He denounced recommenda tions by a special committee named b him, who suggested the calling off of a strikes and urged increased productio for a period of six months. This speci committee favored giving the Presiden every opportunity to settle industri problems without the handicap of con tinual strikes. BAKER'S
COCONUT

The only Coconut
canned in its own milk

The fact that the real coconut milk is in the can with the coconut is the reason that Baker's is so delicious.

Pure coconut milk, you know, is Nature's way of keeping the flakes naturally moist and tender—so Baker's alone has the supreme flavor of the newly picked nut, with all its tropical goodness.

—and here's how to make this wonderful pie:

COCONUT PIE

1 cupful Baker's Canned Coconut
½ to ¾ cupful granulated sugar
2 eggs
1 cupful Coconut milk and milk
2 level tablespoonfuls cornstarch (or flour)
Pinch of salt

Add beaten egg yolks and cornstarch to milk, place over slow fire and stir until cooked thick. Remove from fire and add about two-thirds of the coconut.

Pour into one large (or two small) baked crusts and cover with stiffly beaten egg whites to which two or three tablespoonfuls of powdered or granulated sugar have been added. Sprinkle coconut on top and brown quickly in oven.

NOTE—If meringue pie is not wanted, omit cornstarch and use eggs unseparated in mixture.

Investigating Mexico

SENATOR FALL'S sub-committee named by the Senate's Foreign Relations Committee to conduct an inquiry into the Mexican situation has begun its hearings. Residents of the border states, army officers, representatives of American interests in Mexico, and other scattered groups are being heard. Sessions will be held in Washington, New York and Texas. There are marked indications that an effort will be made to force intervention below the Rio Grande, but the Carranza government is making this move as hard as possible to bring about. The Mexican Congress and the Mexican Supreme Court are working now for a revision of some of the objectionable laws, and Carranza has announced his willingness to enter into negotiations for the settlement of American claims growing out of the troubles in Mexico in the last eight years. Unfortunately the adoption of a more friendly attitude toward the United States in Mexico City usually is accompanied by some hostile incident to further inflame the feelings of the people of the border states. The day the Carranza announcement was published a detachment of Mexican soldiers fired on an American aviator on patrol and wounded him.

The Republican Railway Program

SENATOR CUMMINS of Iowa, as chairman of a sub-committee of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, has introduced a bill embodying the results of several months' investigation of the railway question. The measure outlines the program for disposal of the country's railways which it is expected the Senate majority will favor. The bill as reported divides the railways into twenty to thirty-five regional systems under private control. A Transportation Board to be appointed by the President would have general supervision over the systems and the Interstate Commerce Commission would be maintained to supervise rates and exercise general jurisdiction similar to that reposed in it under present laws. Under one provision of the bill employees would share in any excess of profits accrued under the new method. The proportion of profits to be distributed would be based upon "a fair return upon the value" of the railroad property, this value to be determined by the transportation board. Regulation of the stock and bond issues, wage questions, and all extensions of lines are fully provided for. In a speech accompanying the report, Senator Cummins said that unless some such plan as outlined in the bill is quickly adopted, government control of the railways is certain.

More Pay for Pastors

LAYMEN of the West Ohio Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, meeting at Findlay, O., passed resolutions recommending $1,200 as the minimum wage for ministers "to meet the increasing cost of living."

The ministers, however, will have to make their pastoral calls afoot or behind the old gray mare. A resolution calling for an annual payment of $200 for the upkeep of automobiles was defeated.

Some Novel Church Suppers

By LELIA MUNSELL

ECTING a little novelty into the urch supper not only helps to aw a crowd, but it adds to the attraction of such a supper, an t of the case not unworthy of con- tion. The suppers outlined here en more easily managed than the ary one.

A Progressive Supper

vertise this supper by handbills ndow placards as follows:

A Noah's Ark Supper

HIS provides for both a jolly and profitable evening: Advertise by dow placards. At the top of these placards place a large ark, with a border of animals all around gravitating toward this ark. These may be pen-and-ink or water-color sketches, or they may be cut-out pictures simply pasted in position. In the center place this advertising matter:

Old Noah invites you to sup with him,
Next Wednesday from five until nine.
It will cost you only twenty-five cents,
And will be both funny and fine.
Me-ow, me-ow! Bow, wow! Can you say that,
If you should draw the dog or the cat?
And can you guess what these things mean,
Souvenirs of the ark—Noah never said it.
The rest of the menu we'll give you later.

The room where the supper is served, buffet style, should be shut off. Across the door into it should be hung a large sign, "Noah's Ark." Tickets should be sold just outside this door. With each give a copy of the following menu. The explanations in parentheses, of course, are not to be included in these copies.

1.	Souvenirs of the ark.	(Toothpicks.)
2.	Noah's son.	(Ham sandwiches.)
3.	Noah never said it.	(Home-made fudge.)
4.	What the dove found.	(Olives.)
5.	Silage.	(Salad.)
6.	Water bewitched.	(Coffee.)
7.	Plenty of it in Noah's time.	(Water.)
8.	The cow furnished it.	(Cream.)

Each one is told to check six items on this menu. Then he draws the picture of some animal cut from magazines, etc., and passes through the door. The door-keeper on the inside does not let him pass until he has attempted, at least, to make the noise representing the animal whose picture he carries. Then he takes his checked menu to the tables where the supper is served and gets what he has checked. If he is so unfortunate as to get the "sells" he has to pay extra for such of the real food as he wants.

A Hamburg Fry

IT is not necessary to go to the country for an outdoorsy time, if the church has a lawn of any size. If it has not, have your hamburg fry in some one's back yard, frying the hamburgers on the kitchen stove. Advertise as follows:

A Real Hamburg Fry
On the M. E. Church Lawn
Friday, from six to nine

You make your own sandwiches, then go outdoors to eat them, where you will be served real out-door coffee. Then there will be cantaloups, if you want them.

Sandwiches, 10 cents each, two for 15 cents.
Coffee, five cents per cup.
Cantaloups, ten cents per half melon.
Fun, free.

On a long table arrange, in the order, named, thin sandwich buns, buttered; hot hamburg cakes, onions thinly sliced, beet pickles, sliced. The guests pass down the line and make the sandwiches as desired, adding both onions and pickles if it suits their taste.

The coffee is over a fire out-doors and served there. Cantaloups are also served from a table placed outside.

If thought advisable hot pop-corn, popped over an open fire with a long-handled popper, may also be sold.

This supper eliminates practically all dishwashing, and the only thing to be cooked at the time is the coffee and the hamburg cakes. This makes it an especially easy supper to manage.

AN OPEN LETTER to those who have not secured immediate delivery of their new 1920 Haynes cars

By A. G. SEIBERLING, Vice-President and General Manager
The Haynes Automobile Company, Kokomo, Ind., U. S. A.

IT is a matter of great regret to us that thousands of people have been unable to get immediate delivery of the new 1920 Haynes. The fact that we have succeeded in increasing production to the point where we may soon be on a greater delivery basis is encouraging to us. But we feel that an explanation is due all of the good friends of the Haynes who have waited so patiently and so expectantly for their cars.

During the war our plant was converted into one to serve the government. Our engineers and designers went ahead with their work and produced the new 1920 Haynes. Its tremendous appeal at the opening of the year is a matter of history, and orders continued to come from all parts of this country as well as from abroad.

Our dealers have done their best to take care of their patrons. We realize, however, that even when the situation was understood everyone who ordered a new Haynes was more and more anxious to receive it.

We could not "rush" production. Even had it been mechanically possible there remained the fact that no Haynes is allowed to leave our plant until it has satisfied the rigid inspection tests of our engineers and designers.

Each Haynes car must exemplify the four essential factors of character—beauty, strength, power and comfort—before it can go to its future owner. This extra care on our part is a tangible benefit to the owner, but we know how anybody feels about it when he has ordered a fine new car and cannot get it.

But the orders continue to come in. The new 1920 Haynes is actually an advance model. It is what, in ordinary times, would have been expected of this organization next January. Naturally, every time one is driven from a Haynes dealer's establishment it awakens in the mind of every beholder the desire to own one. Thus the orders show no indication of abatement.

We are doubling the capacity of our plant; we have increased our production. Those who have waited have profited, because they are getting Haynes cars which are wonderfully improved.

The new 1920 Haynes, therefore, is a car worth waiting a little while for. Whether it is the seven-passenger touring car, the four-door, four-passenger roadster, the seven-passenger limousine, the seven-passenger sedan or the four-passenger coupé we know that it comes fully up to the Haynes standard of a car of character.

Our earnest recommendation is that you place your reservation with your Haynes dealer now. You may have to wait a short time before receiving your car, but the value of your investment will more than offset the slight delay.

We have promised your dealer to do our best to fill his orders with the least possible loss of time, and that every car we send him shall measure fully up to the standards created and perfected by the Haynes organization in all the twenty-six years since Elwood Haynes thrilled this country with his invention — America's First Car.

A. G. Seiberling

The Haynes, AMERICA'S FIRST CAR, now exhibited by the government at the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D. C., was invented, designed and built by Elwood Haynes, in 1893.

Church Federation in Colora

THE Rocky Mountain country has ever been the stronghold for new and progressive movements in politics and none the less in church life. There are a number of definite church movements other than the Colorado League of Churches, which is a bit more forward-looking than anything else at present before the country.

First. There is the Community Church movement, which unites the Christians of a community in community service, and with but little of the denominational emphasis. Such churches in Denver as the Washington Park Community church (Methodist) and the Berkley Community church (Congregational) are doing a good work. These churches emphasize community betterment, and while they are strictly denominational churches, they minimize the denominational spirit in such a way as to make all Christians feel at home.

Second. There are a number of federated churches of the Pittsfield type. So far as I can learn these churches are all doing a good work and making the right kind of history. The most remarkable of these churches is in Paonia, Colo., where Quakers, Disciples and Congregationalists have for some time made a happy and useful federation. When you consider what this federation means you will see how much there is of hope for a real federation of God's people. When Quakers, who do not believe in anything other than the baptism of the Spirit, and Disciples, who exalt water baptism; when Quakers, who observe the Lord's Supper by emphasizing the spiritual communion with Christ so much that they do not use the visible elements at all, can unite with Disciples, who insist on the weekly observance of the Supper, there tainly an evidence of the Spirit ence and work. Church Federa

Nine Hundred Grateful Farmers

A TOUCHING incident of the great India famine is related in a letter received from Mrs. Edith Smith, an American missionary in Ahmednagar, which has just been received by the Christian Herald. She writes:

"Let me tell you of one group of native farmers in western India who feel that they have been greatly blessed by Christian Herald funds that were used for their benefit. The Famine Committee of the American Marathi Mission in Ahmednagar decided that the best way to use 1,500 rupees of the money allotted to the district would be to purchase seed grain and give it to farmers in the surrounding villages. Some owned their little farms, some hired them by the year, and still others worked the farm of neighbors on a sharing plan. A complete list was made out and handed to the principal of the high school, the farmers themselves being told to go to the high school on the afternoon of Monday, July 7. Such a

Letters of Appreciation

PERMIT me to express my very great appreciation for the privilege of meeting, through the Christian Herald, Dr. J. H. Jowett. For beautiful and simple language and comprehensive style of stating the truth, I think he has no equal. Surely his life corresponds in every way with the marvelous facts he teaches. His sermons have been to me lighthouses on the hill, for which I am grateful. He says just the right thing in just the right way for me, giving me a clear vision of myself as I stand before God. I wish all men could read and ponder them. Surely they lead to the Pearl of great price which the world is looking for, but unfortunately in a material way. Sometimes they would not hear, if, as the Bible says, "one should rise from the dead."

I have thought that there would yet come a man who would do much to lead the people onward and upward. I have had in my mind many notable ministers in the land, and those likely to come, that could do much. I have thought that when the corporations would do right and treat their workers fairly on a live-and-let-live basis, everything would soon get right. But I feel I must take another view of the matter remember that One has already
"the beginning and the end," the
and the last, Jesus himself.

All ministers will go forward, I to the limit; yet I wanted to pay a tribute to Dr. Jowett.

Two and One-Half Years of Prosperity Ahead

BY LUTHER D. FERNALD

Business Manager of the Christian Herald

ONE thousand six hundred and twenty-four business men out of 1,687 who were asked about elieve that the present business ity and prosperity will continue long period to come.

he average period estimated by these 4 business leaders is 2½ years.

leading New York and Chicago king and investment house (Harris, throp & Co.) wrote on August 1 large number of its customers, asking their opinions on twenty-three im- ant problems of the day. Every sec- of the country was represented by a tantial number and well-balanced ribution of replies.

here was wide divergence on the gue of Nations, on taxation, on a ective tariff, etc., but there was a tically unanimous agreement that:

t—Savings bank deposits have in- sed in every section during the past months.

d—Business is generally prosperous.

d—Merchants are carrying only nor- or less than normal stocks of goods, ced as a measure of precaution be- e of high prices, and therefore in sition requiring constant re-buying.

th—There is a deficiency of labor.

th—There will be no serious reaction lecline in business activity and gen- prosperity for a number of years.

he answers to this latter problem e the most interesting of all. The ific question was:

Granting that a reaction from our sent prosperity and a decline from sent prices is inevitable, for how long you personally believe existing condi- s can be maintained? It is realized t an answer to this question must be uess, but an average of the guesses be interesting."

nly four per cent. of the 1,687 who lied to this question believed that reaction or decline is imminent; per cent. believe that any such de- e is an average of 2½ years away.

ot only was this prediction of two a half years the average prediction the business men from sections all r the United States taken together, it was the average prediction of h of six of the eight sections. The iness men of the New England states imated two and one-half years; so those from the Central, Southern, thwestern, Northwestern and Pacific tes. Only in the Rocky Mountain states was there a lower average—two years. This was offset by a very heavy vote of confidence in the Middle Atlantic states (Delaware, District of Columbia Maryland, New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania) for an average of three years.

As the bankers themselves say on this point, "Presumably a condition that remains relatively static for two and one-half years in this changing country is regarded as about as near permanent as we may ever get in our business experience—at all events, it gives us time to make our calculations deliberately.

"The report as a whole imbues us with fresh confidence in the future and the sane common sense of the people in whose charge it is."

The Only Way to Christian Unity

IS not Christianity on trial, but every religious journal, every re- ous denomination, cult and individ- . The question that confronts every n and woman of responsibility is: ll we be true to Christ and the Old ok? I know of no greater mediums dissemination of truth and right- sness upon the earth than the pulpit d the press. These two factors are ponsible today more than anything for our religious autonomy. There nly one way for us to measure up to duty and obligations in the present sis, i. e., to go back to Christ and his spel. The nearer we come to Christ, nearer we come to each other, and only basis of Christian unity is nd in Christ. Man cannot formu- e a basis for Christian Unity; this been tried and found a failure.

The only way to have Christian Unity is to require and practice just the things Christ and the apostles required and practiced, and avoid everything divisive, which has a tendency to destroy the peace and harmony of the people of God. You know as well as I know that the Baptist cannot and will not consent to be Methodist, and vice versa. Neither will any honest man consent to compromise on Romanism or Universalism. "What saith the Scriptures?" Jesus said to the Jews: "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures and the power of God." That's just the trouble with the world today; men reject the counsel of God when it is against themselves. The churches today are teaching for doctrine the commandments of men, and they are facing the result of such teaching.

Woman's Work Is Never Done

Women haymakers in Europe

"WOMAN'S work is never done" is very true of the women of Europe. During the war they have learned to do all sorts of work which were formerly the prerogative of men, even in countries where women for long years have performed all sorts of laborious tasks. The peasant women never were sticklers about doing men's work. Even sawing wood and haying are all in the day's toil. The picture shows some of the gentler sex at work.

It Is Absolutely Pure

CARNATION Milk is the product of fine herds that graze in the green valleys of Washington and Oregon and on the rolling pastures of Illinois and Wisconsin.

As this fresh milk comes daily from the farms to our evaporatories it is put through the Carnation evaporating process, which removes part of the water. Then it is packed in new containers and sterilized that it may come to you absolutely pure.

Do not confuse Carnation with "sweetened-condensed" milk, for Carnation contains no sugar and it is sterilized.

Use Carnation Milk freely wherever you would use whole milk.

To one part of Carnation Milk add an equal quantity of water. That gives you milk of natural consistency. Use it for cooking and drinking. It is delicious.

Use Carnation Milk undiluted as you would use cream—in your coffee, on cereals and desserts. You need not buy bottled milk if you use Carnation.

Author of Six Hundred Hymn

QUIETLY and unassumingly on the secluded College Hill where Garfield received his college training, later going back as president of his Alma Mater, and where Harold Bell Wright received the rudiments of a college education, lives the gifted hymn writer and author, Jessie Brown Pounds.

Perhaps Mrs. Pounds is best known by her hymn-poem, "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere," which was one of the hymns sung at the funeral of President McKinley. In this hymn she catches a message from the great Oversoul, and in her moment of inspiration gets the message so clear she has been able to comfort thousands, yea, millions, of hungering human hearts. Had she never written another word, she would live through the generations to come in:

"Somewhere the load is lifted
Close by an open gate;
Somewhere the clouds are rifted,
Somewhere the angels wait.

Somewhere, somewhere,
Beautiful Isle of Somewhere,
Land of the true where we live anew,
Beautiful Isle of Somewhere."

Jessie Brown Pounds

But Mrs. Pounds's pen has been prolific, and she has written more than six hundred hymns. Among the most widely known are: "The Way of the Cross Leads Home," "The Touch of His Hand on Mine, "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," "Going Down the Valley," "Scatter Seeds of Loving Deeds," and "Anywhere with Jesus."

"Usually a phrase comes to me," said Mrs. Pounds, "such as 'the way of the cross leads home.' The phrase may stay in my mind or notebook for months before I write it out in hymn for

Mrs. Pounds began writing for p lication when but fifteen years old, has been writing with more or less re larity ever since. "There was period in my life when I did but li writing," said Mrs. Pounds. "You s our four parents were with us, and old people were to be made happy fi so there was but little time left writing."

Some of her early poems attracted t attention of Mr. F more, and he wr her asking h to write some hyn for a new bo upon which he w working. She cepted and has be writing hymns, brettos for cantat and operettas f thirty-seven year

Mrs. Pounds the author of ni books for you people and ev more poems th hymns, the poe having been pu lished in church a secular magazin and never gotten t gether in book for

While Harol Bell Wright was school in Hiram friend brought t Mrs. Pounds a litt sketch written l the future author best sellers, remar ing that it woul encourage the young fellow if Mr Pounds would publish the sketch. Sl accordingly looked over the article an published in the church paper, for whic she was then writing, the Christia Standard, the first story from the pe of Harold Bell Wright.

At present Rev. Mr. Pounds is past of the student church at Hiram, an here Mrs. Pounds charmingly perform the duties which fall to the lot of th pastor's wife in a college communit She is a charming hostess, and her hom is always open to the students and vil lage folk as well.

American Woman in a City of Distres

THIS is the story of the young American woman who achieved in five months one of the largest pieces of relief work the American Red Cross has done in Siberia.

She is Miss Gertrude Heywood of Holyoke, Mass. Last January she was at the head of St. Margaret's School of the Episcopal Church in Tokyo, Japan. Today she has charge of a machine for organized relief in Novonicolaievsk that is handling daily almost 10,000 persons, a machine that she herself built, almost unaided.

When the flood of Russian refugees poured into Siberia in mad flight from Bolshevism, Miss Heywood realized that these refugees needed her more than her pupils at St. Margaret's School. So she left her school to the care of others, and, armed with a commission from the Red Cross to organize immediate relief work among the refugees in Novonicolaievsk, made the long journey to Vladivostok and into the interior of Siberia.

Miss Gertrude Heywood

Miss Heywood and her companion worked steadily. They investigate and aided 1,700 families. They starte a sewing-room where 115 women hav now found employment. They opene an office where clothing and milk ar given out to th ragged and hungr every day. An they took over th management of a orphan asylum tha cares for forty or phans brought fro Petrograd.

Typhus was rag ing among the re ugees. All throug the winter Mis Heywood had at tempted to provid beds and medica treatment for th victims. But th city hospitals ha been crowded eve to the aisles an corridors. Now with the new Re Cross Hospital o 300 beds unde her own direction Miss Heywo found room fo the patients, though the hospital ha run filled to capacity since it opened in April.

The typhus epidemic has waned, but scurvy, cholera and other summe epidemics are still filling the institution and keeping Miss Heywood and her staff busy.

Man and Child Pray for the World

VERY day at noon a man and a child, in the chancel of a mission church in the mountains of Vir- , hold a solemn service of prayer ie world.

ice the man prayed alone. Each day the noonday sun saw Rev. erick W. Neve, rector of St. Paul's copal Church, Ivy Depot, Va., go the little church, unlock the door disappear into the cool shadow in. Then over the sun-bathed ntains and val- floated the clear of the church homes in the ys and on the ides, as they d the sound, ien would turn oment from the k of making din- ready for their -folk and bow r heads. For knew that up the church the or knelt alone pray, and that prayers were not for them, his ishioners, but the missions of Church in the places of the h—for all the k of building new world upon istian ideals, ich is to be increased and expanded the Nation-wide Campaign of the iscopal Church.

ne day as the man knelt in the church, ne with his prayers, he heard the or open. A flood of sunlight illumined place, then died away. He heard the und of feet pattering up the aisle.

Rev. Frederick W. Neve and his four-year-old daughter

No one had ever come to his solitary service of prayer. At the end of his petition he turned to see who had joined him.

It was his little daughter, four years old. She had knelt beside him in the chancel. At her side she held her best beloved doll, kneeling, too.

Since then, every day, save when the rains beat upon the little mountain church, the child comes from her play when the church bell rings and kneels beside the man. And he says the prayer for missions and the prayer for his parish. And then he rests his hand upon the child's head and asks a blessing upon her.

And when the prayers are said, the child and the man stand, hand in hand. The man raises his other hand and speaks. For the child it is the ceremony of "blessing the people." For the man it is invocation for power in his own work among the Virginia mountains and for the work of the Church everywhere.

Out from the mountains the story of this service of prayer for the world which a man and a child hold together has gone to church after church enlisted in the Episcopal Nation-wide Campaign, helping to achieve the goals for which prayers are said every day in the little mountain church.

Japanese Children in School

ASHION in schoolrooms has changed materially since this photograph was taken as well as in ucational methods and the subject tter taught. In the old days the iting of Japanese characters was the incipal subject taught and the hard- t to master—as it still is. After six ears of hool Jap- iese boys d girls, less they ave been ception- lly bril- ant, can ad only mple books d newspapers in eir native ngue.

In the ldenschool- ays Japanese litera- ure and his- ory and the books of the various pagan eligions observed in that country were aithfully studied. Now the Japanese tudent receives an education which ompares in many respects with that btained in our own public schools. Native schoolrooms have been modeled o a considerable extent on ours and the ittle benches which formerly served as lesks for the pupils, as shown in the accompanying picture of a Japanese boy and girl being taught how to form Japanese characters by an old Buddhist priest, are seldom seen nowadays.

Japanese children learning to write the characters of their language

This change in the character, methods and materials of the schools of Japan was due largely to the work of Christian missions. They stimulated the desire of the Japanese for an education and showed them how American schools are conducted. This has been especially true of the kindergarten, which the whole Japanese nation is enthusiastically adopting.

The Episcopal Church was among the first to introduce the Western kindergarten into Japan. There are now thirty-six in the Episcopal districts of Tokyo and Kyoto alone, and this number will be increased through the Nation-wide Campaign which the Episcopal Church is conducting to expand its various activities all over the world.

Japanese parents no longer oppose the teaching of Christian doctrines to their children in these kindergartens and other schools conducted by the missionaries, and in them is found the most effective means of reaching their parents and Christianizing the nation. It is possible that Christian primary schools also will be established in Japan by the Episcopal Church as a result of its campaign, as there is great need for such institutions to keep the children in touch with Christian influences after they leave the kindergartens.

Attendance at the public schools of Japan is compulsory for the period of six years, and it is estimated by those who have studied the subject that considerably more than 90 per cent. of the nation's children are in school.

The South Needs Schools

IMPROVED conditions on Mississippi plantations would do much to check migration northward of negroes is the opinion of Southern leaders who expressed their views to investigators of the Department of Labor.

Unrest existed among the negroes for years, they assert, but there was no outlet. The opening of industrial opportunities in the North during the great war provided an outlet. The negroes took advantage of it.

wages. While the government objects very strongly to any reference to this departure in policy as an introduction of the Soviet principle in industry, labor is watching the experiment very carefully.

Roosevelt Grave a Mecca. From 5,000 to 10,000 people have been journeying to Theodore Roosevelt's grave at Oyster Bay every Sunday the past summer to pay their respects to the memory of the great American. Souvenir hunters have proved such a source of annoyance, however, that a high iron fence has been constructed all about the Roosevelt plot to keep away the idle curious. The project for a Roosevelt Memorial has reached the point where a great park at Oyster Bay has almost been decided on.

The New National Debt. Treasury figures show that the National debt on August 30 reached the huge sum of $26,596,701,648, an increase of nearly three-quarters of a billion in August.

FOREIGN

The Dutch-Belgian Dispute. Feeling is running high in Holland over the negotiations with Belgium over territorial concessions. Some disposition was manifest in The Hague to break off the conferences, but more sober counsel has prevailed and the conversations will continue. The Dutch press, apparently with the support of the government, declares no concessions will be granted.

Disorders in Munich. Munich once more is the scene of much disorder. The Communists are active again and the city has been placed under martial law. Machine-guns are stationed at many of the street intersections and armed troops are controlling the business center.

Canada and the Treaty. The Canadian Parliament has been called in special session to ratify the Treaty of Peace with Germany. In his opening address, the Governor-General urged prompt action.

British Destroyer Sunk. The British destroyer Victoria, one of the squadron in the Baltic Sea, has been torpedoed and sunk by the Bolsheviki with a loss of eight of her crew.

The Situation in Budapest. Word has been received from Paris that the Allies will order the Rumanians to evacuate Hungary. It is the intention to have Senator Jonnart, who ousted the king of Greece, deliver the ultimatum to Bucharest and fix a time limit for its acknowledgment. Rumania will be required to make reparation for all goods requisitioned by her army in Hungary. The new Hungarian government which succeeded Archduke Joseph's régime is denounced in Central Europe as extremely reactionary, and there are many signs that its tenure will be brief, although nothing has been said definitely as to the Supreme Council's attitude toward it.

French War Loss. André Tardieu in speaking in the Chamber of Deputies on the Peace Treaty made the announcement that the French war loss was 26 per cent. of all men mobilized. Fifty-seven per cent. of all men with the colors under thirty-one years of age were killed.

Troubles in Albania. Italian troops in Albania have been engaged in sharp guerrilla warfare with Albanian tribesmen. A large Italian detachment, after serious losses, has been compelled to fall back toward Durazzo.

Italian Crown Lands. King Victor of Italy has sent word to the premier that he is giving to the country all the crown lands for the benefit of Italian veterans. Already six estates belonging to the royal family have been turned over for various national uses.

ONTRIBUTORS to the Christian Herald Children's Home fund will interested to know that the Inter- tional Film Company has made a oving picture of the Home which is ing incorporated in their "News eekly," Current Events No. 33, and shown in most of the moving picture eaters of the country.

The picture first shows the assemblage the children at a mission on the far ast Side of New York, then their edical examination in our offices, their parture from the Bible House, with r president, Mr. Patterson, bidding em "have a pleasant vacation, chil- en," and their arrival at the Home Nyack, with a cordial welcome from e superintendent, Miss Goering.

The film then follows the new arrivals nder the showers in the magnificent athhouse. The children who have been t the Home several days are next een on the spacious playground, where hey are actively enjoying the numerous wings, slides and other amusement and ecreational devices which the gener- sity of our subscribers has made pos- ible. Music for the games is provided y a hurdy-gurdy, around which you vill see the children gathering.

No picture can even approach the ome itself in its beauty and loveli- ess, but we believe you will find it vell worth while to make an especial ffort to see this film at your favorite theater and through it realize a small part of the joy and happiness which your contributions to the Children's Home bring to the poor children of New York.

Calls on Church to Curb Unrest

"TO BRING men back to the spiritual standard, to make Christ's principles an impelling force in the reconstruction of society, and to teach men to think true and live true, is the mighty task to which the Church is called."

Secretary of State Lansing said this in an address to the New Era Conference of the Presbyterian Church, at Lake Geneva, Wis.

"This is a time of remodeling and reconstruction. Out of the ruins of the old world order shattered by the war there must be erected a new structure based upon sounder principles.

"New ideas and new conceptions of society's obligations to the individual have been released, and there is manifested a radicalism in their advocacy which threatens the disruption of the present social order.

"The peril lies in the exaltation of physical might, the false doctrine of the right to do because of the power to do, and assumption of selfish desire as the ultimate motive of human action.

"The world can only meet this grave situation by renewing and strengthening its spiritual life, by turning away from materialism and implanting in men's souls those great fundamental principles which Christ taught."

Buying Shoes by the Squeak

THE idea of buying shoes by the squeak rather than by their appearance and durability has something incongruous in it to any one who as a boy or girl had to go through that dreadful ordeal of walking down the aisle of a church, already filled, and perhaps with the minister preaching or reading the Bible lesson, with each shoe squeakily and loudly protesting against every step toward a pew near the front of the church. Reproachful eyes of the older people seemed to accuse one of making his shoes squeak on purpose, while the children looked on in curiosity and wonder that one should dare walk in and create so much disturbance instead of waiting outside until a hymn should be sung that would drown out the noise.

Yet there is a place where shoes were once purchased for their squeaking power. The amount of squeak to the shoe had a relation to the price. The country was the Hawaiian Islands, now a territory belonging to the United States, and the time was soon after the missionaries from this country had introduced shoes and other clothing to the natives.

The native Hawaiians no longer need to be urged to wear shoes and clothes or to accept the principles of the Christian religion, most of them already belonging to some church, but there are many thousand more Japanese in the islands than Hawaiians, and almost as many Chinese, a large proportion of whom are still heathen. It is these people who will be reached, not with shoes and clothes, but with school teachers and preachers of the Living Word.

To resume about squeaking shoes: The louder the noise a pair of shoes would make the more a Hawaiian of the olden days would pay for them. A missionary who had a foreign shoemaker in his congregation tells of a native who came to leave an order with him for a pair of shoes. He told the shoemaker he wanted them "made with a squeak in them."

"How much squeak do you want," he asked; "half a dollar's worth or just a quarter's worth?"

"I want the largest squeak that can be made," replied the Hawaiian, "even if it costs a dollar."

It was years before the Hawaiians became accustomed to wearing our stiff shoes, and they often took them off and carried them until they reached the door of the church, school or missionary's house.

EFFECTO AVENUE

SOME day the traffic cop's goin' to stop some of these faded gas buggies and tell 'em the war's over and chase 'em into a store for a can of Effecto Auto Enamel.

Effecto AUTO FINISHES

Here's how it works: Mr. A. Gamache, with the Starke, Seybold Co., Ltd., of Montreal, Canada, wanted to sell his four year old Ford. His best offer was $225. After thinking it over, he spent a few evenings in his own garage giving the old bus two coats of Effecto, and five days later he sold it for $475. More than doubled its market value! What Mr. Gamache did, others can do, and are doing every day.

You probably won't want to sell the old car after you refinish it with Effecto Auto Finishes. A little of your time, two or three dollars worth of Effecto and 24 to 48 hours for drying, will make the old boat look almost like a 1920 show car! And the finish will outlast the finish on most new cars.

Effecto is the genuine, original, high-luster auto enamel; easy-working, self-leveling and quick-drying; not a wax, polish or paint. Made in nine snappy enamel colors, Finishing (clear varnish) and Top & Seat Dressing, which renews and waterproofs all kinds of tops, seats and upholstery. Dries in fifteen minutes and positively will not stick to clothes.

A can of Effecto Auto Black Enamel in your garage comes in mighty handy for touching up rusty spots and banged fenders.

There is no substitute that has yet equaled the genuine Effecto Auto Finishes. Be sure you get Effecto.

If you can't find Effecto Auto Finishes at local paint, hardware or accessory stores, Send us $1.70 for a Quart of Black Enamel enough for the average small car, which will be sent transportation charges prepaid.

Color card showing complete line of colors, and names of local dealers sent on request.

ISAIAH 61 The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

22 A [b] little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.

THE [a] Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim [c] liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To [d] proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and [e] the day of vengeance of our God; to [f] comfort all that mourn; ★

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, [g] to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the [h] planting of the LORD, [i] that he might be glorified. ★

4 ¶ And they shall [j] build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And [k] strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But [l] ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For [m] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, [n] and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as [o] a bridegroom decketh [1] himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause [p] righteousness [q] and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: [a] and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a [b] crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou [c] shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed [1] Desolate: but thou shalt be called [2] Hephzibah, and thy land [3] Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and [4] as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

8 Bring forth therefore fruits meet for [1] repentance:

9 And think not to say within yourselves, [l] We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.

10 And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: [m] therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

11 I [n] indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: [o] he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire:

13 ¶ Then cometh Jesus [r] from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.

14 But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?

15 And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.

16 And [t] Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the [u] Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him:

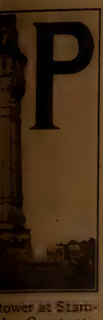
TO MAKE AN OLD CITY NEW

Constantinople, the Most Antiquated Metropolis of the Modern World, Will Be Given Up-to-Date Facilities for Handling the Occidental Traffic to the Near East



The tower at Stamboul, Constantinople

POSSIBLE transfer of the control of Constantinople, mystic city of the Near East, from the hands of the Turk to the United States, as has been suggested by President Wilson and will probably be taken up by Congress for discussion shortly, will doubtless result in a great change being wrought in the famous capital of the once powerful Ottoman Empire and center of Islam.

Old customs and medieval methods in force in Constantinople will unquestionably go by the board as the enterprising spirit of an enterprising power charges the atmosphere of the picturesque Turkish metropolis that spreads over seven hills on the European side of the Bosporus. Probably no other city in the world has clung more tenaciously to antiquated ways of doing things than Constantinople, despite its close proximity to many progressive nations.

One of the oddest things in Constantinople is the universal mode of transportation. Old Turks, together with Bulgarians, Albanians and others who make up the motley population of Constantinople, serve as human vans. They are known as "hamals," or custom-house porters, and they can be seen plodding along the streets with tremendous loads on their backs. For instance, should you go to a furniture store and order six or seven chairs and a table your entire purchase would probably be securely fastened together in a pile on the back of a hamal and delivered by him to your home. It seems there is nothing too unwieldy or heavy for them to carry, even pianos and big loaded casks not being excepted.

These hamals are vigorously opposed to the introduction of any motor trucks or horse-propelled wagons that will interfere with their business, and so far they have been almost entirely successful in their fight to retain a monopoly on the hauling business.

Some day, doubtless soon after the question of the destiny of Constantinople is settled, docking facilities will be provided in this important commercial port. There are tremendous possibilities that have long lain dormant for developing the commercial advantages of Constantinople. Heretofore and at present all loading is done by lighters. Ships lie out in the Bosporus, which has one of the most treacherous and uncertain currents of any channel in the world, and load cargo from these unwieldy carriers. The work is very dangerous and very slow.

The Golden Horn, a natural channel running through Constantinople

While the British have been in control of Constantinople since the Turks capitulated, little has been done so far toward improving the sanitary conditions. Epidemics have been frequent during recent years, and the United States naval authorities stationed there on the U. S. S. Scorpion report that disease will continue to run rampant until such time as a campaign to clean up the historic city is started.

In no other city in the world can there be seen more dense throngs on the downtown streets than in Constantinople. It is almost impossible to make any headway on some of the main thoroughfares during the busy hours of the day. Fifth Avenue, New York, on parade days is duplicated every day in the capital of the land of the fez.

Just as soon as the Dardanelles were opened and American ships bringing flour and foodstuffs to Rumania and Armenia reached Constantinople the Turk immediately resumed shipments to the United States. Mohair, hides, manganese ore and tapestries are at present the leading exports of Turkey. From "soundings" which I took during a recent visit of several weeks in Constantinople as a member of a naval crew of a cargo transport, I believe the sentiment for the United States is more friendly in the Turkish capital than for any other Allied nation. And although Constantinople has from time immemorial been a city of turmoil and fighting, I believe the United States will be able to bring order out of chaos and sow the seeds of civilization and Christian ideals if the older Turk is driven over into the Asiatic side. Less than one-third of the population of Constantinople is Turkish.

There is probably no other city in the world more beautiful to gaze upon from a ship's side coming into the Bosporus from the Sea of Marmora, and there is probably no other metropolitan city that is more dirty and foul in many of its principal business and residential districts than Constantinople.

In Christian hands Constantinople could be made one of the greatest cities in the world.

A Hawaiian Heroine for All the Ages

THE world offers no sublimer example of courage and fearlessness than that shown by Kapiolani, descendant of a long line of Hawaiian kings and ruler in her own right of a large district in the southern part of the island of Hawaii, when she braved the wrath of the fire goddess Pele and broke the most obstinate and long-lived of the tabus which cursed her native islands.

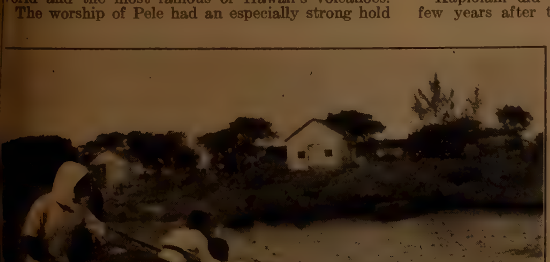
Kapiolani was an ignorant, superstitious savage, despite her royal lineage and high rank, with several husbands and addicted to strong drink, when she was converted to Christianity by the early missionaries from the United States to the then Sandwich Islands.

Though idolatry had been overthrown and the tabu abolished in Hawaii, many of the natives still believed in Pele, the fire goddess, who lived in Halemaumau, the House of Everlasting Burning, the great lake of molten, seething lava which boils forever in the crater Kilauea, the largest active crater in the world and the most famous of Hawaii's volcanoes.

The worship of Pele had an especially strong hold upon the islanders, and it survived after the other tabus had been broken. No one dared, no matter how thirsty he might be, to eat the thirst-quenching, flame-colored ohelo berries which grew in great profusion on the sides of the mountain sacred to this goddess of fire, lightning and earthquake, until he had first climbed to the edge of the crater and thrown half of the branch of berries into the seething caldron.

Pele, according to native legend, had taken up her residence in Halemaumau, the House of Everlasting Burning, to escape from Kama-puaa, the water god, a huge monster, half hog, half man, who desired to wed her. Kama-puaa poured floods of water into the lake of fire in his efforts to capture her, but Pele's slaves, the fire demons, at once turned the water into steam and hurled such great showers of fire and stones upon the monster that he was driven back into the sea. Much of the worship of the Hawaiians was in attempt to propitiate Pele.

Kapiolani did not accept the new faith until a few years after the first missionaries had arrived, but soon after she had been baptized she decided to break the power of the fire goddess Pele—an act which aided the spread of Christianity in Hawaii more than any other single thing aside from the first breaking of the tabus in the island of Oahu. Since her act of courage the Hawaiian Islands, so far as the natives are concerned, have been Christian.



Fishermen hauling in a net at Haleiwa, Hawaii

IT WAS in December, 1824, that Kapiolani, who only a few years before had been an ignorant, superstitious, sensual heathen, decided to break the thralldom of her people to Pele by defying the fire goddess in her own domains. Despite the protests of her dismayed subjects, she went to the mission at Hilo, not far from Kilauea, and, accompanied by eighty of her subjects, made the difficult 100-mile journey across the rough lava beds of the mountains.

"The tabus are abolished. There is but one Great God; he will keep me from harm," Kapiolani told her doubting subjects. She was stopped again and again on her journey to the volcano by men and women who implored her to return home and not risk Pele's anger.

"If I am destroyed you may all believe in Pele; but if I am not, then you must all turn to the true God," was her only answer.

Near the crater she was met by a priestess of Pele, who claimed authority from the goddess herself and warned Kapiolani not to enter the sacred precincts of the volcano with unbelief and opposition in her heart under penalty of death.

Nothing daunted, she continued her journey. Along the mountain path grew the ohelo berries sacred to Pele, which no one dared eat without permission of the goddess. Kapiolani picked and ate freely of them without making the required offering of half of the berries to Pele. Nothing happened to her.

She led the way down the steep, rocky path into the crater, across the hot lava beds where the ground trembled under their feet and steam issued from every crevice, clear up to the edge of Halemaumau itself, the House of Everlasting Burning. To show to her people her disrespect and unbelief in Pele and her power Kapiolani cast stone after stone into the great lake of fire.

To her terrified people she said:

"Jehovah is my God. He kindled these fires. I fear not Pele. Should I perish by her anger, then you may all fear her power; but if Jehovah save me in breaking her tabus, then you must fear and love Jehovah. The gods of Hawaii are vain. Great is the goodness of Jehovah in sending missionaries to turn us from these vanities to the living God."

Then on the very threshold of the sacred residence of Pele a prayer to the God of the Christians arose, followed by the singing of a Christian hymn which could be heard above the roaring of the fiery furnace.

They returned across the very bed of the crater, her followers doubtless expecting every minute that the thin crust of earth would give way under their feet and precipitate them into the fires below or that showers of hot lava and stones would be thrown after them from Halemaumau.

But they returned unharmed, and the power of Pele, the thralldom to the dread tabu, was broken in the islands.

How Do You Back Your City?

AS a city, as a town, where are you? Do people know you exist? Are you making money? Are you growing, or are you standing still, "dead in the shell"? If the latter, do you want to get out and put yourself on the map? Well, wake up, get up and do something. Take stock, then organize. Get together, body and spirit, heart and soul. Find out what you have and what you need, then get it. Cooperation, common sense, judgment and determination will get almost anything that you may desire.

Be loyal to and a good booster of your own town, but do not fail to appreciate the good points of other places. If you see something worth while in another city, why not adopt and adapt it to your own? Do not, however, adopt a thing just because it is new, nor yet reject it for the same reason. If you find old fogyism and obsolete methods in vogue in your city, by all means cut them out.

Make your town so good and healthful and attractive that people will like to live in it. Foster your business interests and encourage others to come. Keep abreast of the times. If there are places of natural beauty or uniqueness in your vicinity, advertise them on all possible occasions. If your city or town be the birthplace of some famous man or the site of important historical events, let that be known. Newspaper and magazine writers are always glad to feature such things. When you advertise, do not be afraid to say, "Birthplace of the Republican Party," "Home of the Great Redwoods," or something of the kind; and if you have interesting anniversaries, celebrate them in such a manner as to attract more than local attention.

Possibly there is nothing very striking or interesting about your town; nevertheless, there is something that sets it apart from other places. It is either the cleanest, the most beautiful, or the most moral city in your part of the state, or it may be a natural business center. There is certainly some reason why it exists. Make the most of that in your bid for popularity and an increase of population. If you need manufactures or people or shipping facilities, do not be afraid to ask for them. Be generous but sensible in the matter of bonuses and franchises. Many a city has made concessions for which its children and children's children suffered and cursed it. Let your growth be a healthy, normal one.

Plan not only for today, but for tomorrow. It is said that our government in recent years has purchased property in the City of Washington at an expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars, which years ago sold for a song, because it was believed that it would never be needed for government purposes. Villages and cities also have neglected to provide for expansion, and years after, when it did come, were obliged to go without suitable parks or pay large sums for grounds covered with buildings that had to be razed. Reserve some open squares and some good factory sites for the hour when you will need them. Or if you want to be a college town, plan with that in view. Do not be visionary, nor yet shortsighted. If you are going to be a business city, that is one thing. If you wish to be a health and pleasure resort, that is another. If you intend to be a busy, thriving metropolis, that is still another, but if you expect to be a merely residential location, that calls for still other plans.

The city which would prosper and grow must have a well-organized, progressive business organization of some kind, and that organization must be supported by public opinion and cooperation. The right kind of public spirit is one of the most valuable assets a city can have. Without the proper kind of backing, the most earnest efforts cannot prove other than abortive. What your town is, what it can do, and what it will do, depends upon you and those associated with you. Be alive to your opportunities. The future holds possibilities which you can convert into realities if you but will.

Would You Say A Mother Was Crazy-

—If she subjected her baby to Eas winds, overheating, indigestion, cold baths—or kept it awake all day?

Certainly!

Think of baby's sleep. During the first six months especially it is a matter of the utmost importance.

But the creases and folds of a baby's delicate skin cause friction. So do its clothes, coverings, all textures that touch it. Involuntary habits add to the torment. How can a baby get that sleep?

Kora-Konia is the lightest touch that could possibly be laid upon a baby's burning distress. With the softness of sheer silk it dries and soothes. Plentifully dusted over the tiny body, it interposes a cool, comforting surface against the anguish—and it adheres gently for hours.

A cooling, healing powder, with several ingredients of recognized medicinal value! It is antiseptic, resists moisture, and brings lasting relief.

No baby—and we may say incidentally, no adult—will chafe if plentifully dusted with Kora-Konia. It simply smooths away all possible friction.

ristianity's Practical Program

ternational Sunday School Lesson for September 28

Matt. 21 : 1-9, 15, 16

By Rev. GEORGE D. ALLISON, Ph.D.

IE work of the past quarter in the Sunday schools has consisted of twelve lessons on the a cal program of organized Chris- y. The particular solutions de- ed by the problems of our day will ıder these headings if thoughtfully ed: The Organized Church; Fel- ip, Worship and Evangelism; The l View, Social Interest and Tem- ce; The Kingdom on Earth and in en.

ile there have been some real tian people who deliberately reject lea of an organized church, the vast rity of consecrated followers of Christ have seen the need for vis- mity, in order to bring about the st results in his name. It is nized Christianity that has conduct- eligious education throughout the ries, that has sent out the great eering missionaries and built the lom in the distant places of our land. The Church is the army e Lord. The local church may be ght of as the company and, to carry the figure, the great denominations the "army corps," or "divisions," e Army of King Jesus.

ristianity has rites and ceremonies hief purpose of which is instruction, stry and inspiration. Jesus never at that they should become formal, even regarded as essential to salva- . They were to be "not lords of faith" but "helpers of our joy." tism signalizes entrance into the nized ranks; it is the putting on of khaki of faith. The Lord's Supper, its solemn renewal of allegiance im, is more like the salute to the rs, or the review of loyal troops.

hen the lesson committee went on et forth the ordinary functioning of organized Church, they quite rally put fellowship first, even before worship and evangelism. We do not often realize that the interrelationships of Christian men and women are so fundamental from the point of view of religion. But Jesus believed that religion is life, and that a right attitude toward one's neighbor is basic.

There is no religion without worship of some kind. Christianity provides for its finest expression. One of the ways in which we are to influence the world is by praying, and by praying in social worship.

The program calls for constant growth by accretion. The Church must gain from the world without. Sometimes its evangelism will be by masses, at other times mainly by individual accessions through friends, through personal workers, through the special work of preacher and missionary.

Christianity is a world religion and demands a world view. Those who are narrow and parochial of outlook fail to catch the vision of Him who said, in those days of small beginnings, "the field is the world."

While overflowing national boundaries in its zeal for the Lordship of Jesus, the Church must apply his teachings to every-day life at home or abroad. "The Social Gospel" is no new thing. All branches of the Church are aroused to the need of industrial justice, of increased cooperation in production, of wiser law-enforcement, and a governed world. Temperance work is a special problem worthy of special treatment. We hope that a new era has dawned for the world, of which our land may be thankful to be the initiator.

The Lord's Prayer teaches us to look for the establishment of God's will on earth, as it is in heaven. The practical program of Christianity may be summed up in endeavor for that Kingdom here below; according to the teachings of our Master. "What would Jesus do?"

Little girls in America who complain because they have to help mother ought to be glad they don't live in Japan, where at least 250,000 little girls are hired out to help other little girls' mothers

Tokyo girls doing the family wash

Episcopal Church workers have reported to Nation-Wide Campaign headquarters that many of the poorer families hire their young daughters out to women of the middle and upper classes to act as komori, or baby-tenders. Such girls are at the beck and call of their mistresses day and night. For hours at a time, even while playing hopscotch in the street with other komori, the babies are on their backs every minute of the time. They must help about the housework, too, with never a moment for study or play. Their pay is their board, a garment or two during the year, and perhaps a little cash.

It is estimated that there are at least 250,000 komori in Japan. Formerly they were neglected almost entirely, not alone by the Japanese educational and philanthropic institutions, but even by the missionaries, because their long hours of work did not permit them any time to study. Of recent years Christian missions have been able to make a beginning at reaching the komori and the girls of the heimin, and it is believed that the work among the girls of this class will be greatly increased.

A Bushel of Food

In a Package of Quaker Oats And at One-Tenth the Cost

A 35-cent package of Quaker Oats contains 6221 calories—the energy measure of food value.

You would buy a bushel of ordinary mixed foods to equal that calory value. And that bushel would cost you ten times 35 cents.

Here is what it would take of certain good foods to furnish you 6221 calories:

To Supply 6221 Calories

In Quaker Oats	1 Pkg.	In Potatoes	21 Lbs.
In Round Steak	7 Lbs.	In Hubbard Squash	65 Lbs.
In Hen's Eggs	7 Doz.	In Young Chicken	20 Lbs.
In Cabbage	55 Lbs.	In String Beans	36 Lbs.

And here is what those calories would cost at this writing in some necessary foods:

Cost of 6221 Calories

In Quaker Oats	35c	In Hen's Eggs	$3.12
In Round Steak	$2.06	In Fish about	2.25
In Veal or Lamb	3.12	In Potatoes	65c

Consider these facts in your breakfasts. The oat is the greatest food that grows. It is almost a complete food—nearly the ideal food. It supplies essentials which most foods lack.

Direct Drive Conserves Power in

Light Four

12 H. P. on Draw-Bar

25 H. P. on Belt Pulley

Draws three bottoms

Turns an acre an hour

TRACTOR economy and tractor power depend largely on the proportion of the power developed by the motor that is delivered to the draw-bar.

In simplicity and economy the direct spur gear drive of the Huber Light Four is unequalled. There are no bevel gears—simply a friction clutch and spur gear reduction to the driving wheels.

Other reasons why the Huber develops such large power in proportion to its weight are: the high wheels roll easier and afford a larger area of "traction grip"; center draft conserves power by avoiding "side pull"; high-grade extra strong materials reduce weight.

These features are the result of 20 years' development. They are behind the Huber reliability that has created thousands of satisfied Huber owners.

Weight 5,000 pounds; pulls three 14" bottom plows; 12 h. p. delivered to the draw-bar; 25 h. p. at the belt; Waukesha, four-cylinder motor; Perfex Radiator; Hyatt Roller Bearings; burns gasoline, kerosene or distillate; center draft; two speeds, 2½ and 4 miles per hour.

Write for "The Tractor in the Making". It tells the interesting history of tractor development.

Training Ministers for Civic Leadership

PRESBYTERIAN ministers of country parishes, heretofore expected to be only preachers and teachers, are now to be taught to take charge of community movements, according to an announcement from the Board of Home Missions. Training classes are to be founded in connection with the New Era movement, in which young ministers are to be taught the business of leading good roads movements, financial and reform campaigns and other civic work. From $10,000 to $25,000 is to be appropriated for the special education of promising young clergymen along these lines.

Describing the plan Dr. Warren H. Wilson, of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions, said:

"The demands upon a pastor in a small community are far beyond what he has been prepared to meet. He has been taught to preach, to study the Bible, to teach and to visit his people in their homes. But he is called on to lead the community in work for better roads, consolidation of schools, in reform movements, financial 'drives' and in recreational problems. He is called on to be a pastor, not a preacher only.

"The home board has for several years assembled country ministers in short courses, usually in the summer, for training in community work. This year the number of schools was thirteen. This is the tenth year of the board's experience.

"A new plan is under consideration by the home board. We purpose to bring a selected number of pastors to a central place for a year's graduate study. This year will be divided between field work under special direction and classroom work in religious and social service. This method has been very successful in the immigrant work of the board in training expert leaders for city and immigrant service by means of a fellowship year in Europe."

No Appetizer, But Appetite

NOW that the cocktail is no more, experts who never have found a flaw in this once popular appetizer feel free to speak their minds about it.

"An appetizer?" demands Copeland Townsend, of the Majestic Hotel. "Why we have found that it not only failed to produce an appetite, but succeeded in consuming it. Since the public is not drinking cocktails or highballs before and with meals, the course dinner, luncheon and even breakfast are becoming popular.

"Men who never before thought of ordering desserts or sweets in any form now take heavy desserts. The belief that liquor stimulates the appetite is an erroneous one."

The Newspaper in North Africa

"EXTRA!" shouted in the streets of Algiers or any other North African town, would not bring the people of the streets crowding around the newsboy, but would send them hurrying, as much as it lies in an Arab to hurry, to the "office" of the public reader.

He holds an important position, his duty being to pass on the news of the day to illiterate citizens. It is not surprising that most of the Arab population should be illiterate, since the language used in writing and printing is literary Arabic, the very same in which the Koran was composed twelve centuries ago. It has been preserved intact, while the spoken tongue has gradually changed, as spoken tongues will. Literary Arabic today is about as much like the spoken language as Latin is like French. Ninety per cent. of the people do not understand the language in which their books are written.

An interesting experiment has been begun by the Rev. Percy Smith, a missionary in North Africa, who is translating the Bible and the hymns of the Church into the ordinary speech of the people instead of into literary Arabic.

Making the Home Attractive to the Growing Boy and Girl

Y FATHER was a farmer. He loved God's great out-of-doors. Often during the lull between lowing and harvest, father would it us children by saying, "If you e ready by Saturday, we will go to lpa Hyde's, or Uncle George's"; it was in September, "the county n,'" the latter necessitating a few clothes and a day's baking and en roasting.

ichever trip we planned took us three distinct strips of country ty miles in length; beautiful, pro- ve land, but such bungled homes! look back over these childhood , just one do I recall with pleasure; one was "a thing of beauty" and e "a joy forever." A child has a to beautiful things in early life ast, contrary as this statement is he life of the unfortunate child ad today.

is one farm to which I refer had ry-and-a-half house painted white, lawn fenced so that chickens did scratch up the flowers, and a shed e machinery was protected as well dden from view instead of standing hed and rusted in the field. The was directly back of the house, cow-yard and hog-lot on the down- l slope from this. In short, it was at, well-kept place. To this day I not know who lived there, but I always cherished a silent admira- for its occupants. I also often dered why our place as well as rs could not look as well.

hose three twenty-mile trips con- ited my knowledge of the outer ld during my childhood.

have since traveled across about every state in the Union. The ill-arranged buildings on the average farm call to consciousness my one ideal impression of childhood so firmly fixed in my mind—the white house and a lawn like you see in town. Oftentimes I see the barn nearer the road than is the house, sometimes actually in front of the house; a chicken-house dropped where a cyclone might have left it, or the hog-house near the road opposite the house, which is of all things most unpardonable. I feel that this carelessness should be righted. The Farmers' Institute might well give time to the discussion of this topic. In your midst may be a young person who has artistic views along this line. Look him up. If it develops that no one capable is found available, I would suggest that a landscape gardener be hired by the county to go around to farmers and kindly offer a plan of improvement. Perhaps moving one outbuilding or planting a hedge, or a few changes made with a small outlay of money, would give an entirely new appearance to the home.

I love the farm better than any city park. It should be a park at work. God made the farmer's grass as green as the city lawn. We have more of his gifts. We have the fragrance of the apple-blossom, the scent of the new-mown hay, and the shower, not from dirty roofs, but straight from the clouds. Let us do our part by so arranging our buildings that a passer-by may say, "There is a home"; that our children may not say, "Father made money, but I was always ashamed to bring any one home with me, especially after I went away to school." H. A. M.

What Do You Teach Your Children About Outdoors?

HAT children learn about outdoor life depends very much upon ir family and their school teacher, ess they happen to live in the coun- . Just a little encouragement, how- r, from parents will develop in dren a fine worth-while interest in door things that not only tends to p them outdoors where they will w strong and healthy, but broaden ir minds and viewpoint all through .

The child who is only amused with vies, a trip to an amusement resort, dy or expensive toys, gets only f out of life, and an artificial half t by the time he is eighteen will make n blasé and bored with everything t does not cost considerable money. Every mother with just a little effort, d scarcely any expense, can teach her ldren a great many simple things out outdoor life. If she is city born d bred it will amply repay her to rn a few everyday things and pass on to them, for such an interest once rted may develop into a fascinating bby or even vocation for the child as grows up. For example, what does e average child know about the com- n birds? Could he name a dozen sides the sparrow and the robin? es he know that many of them bring several families every summer? Does know the different colors of different rds' eggs? And each one's particular ng? Color, which always appeals to ildren, is a good way to begin bird udy. A suggestion of how to tell birds color is a good first step. Any of the ove things can be taught a child with little direction and observation.

What does the average child know out flowers? If he has had nature dy in school perhaps he has had some ject lessons in the study of seed de- lopment or the comparison of leaf ms—that is, the shape of different ves—but the chances are that he ld not name and recognize a dozen rden or a dozen wild flowers. Surely ry child deserves to know just the mple everyday names of all the com- n flowers and plants, for it means an increased appeciation, all through life, of the beautiful. Even the common weeds, such as plantain, bindweed, ragweed, St. Johnswort or chickweed, is part of common education. Such a study of plants is refining for the boy, especially the one who is so practical that nothing but machinery interests him, and health producing for the delicate girl who needs every inducement to be out in the fresh air.

As for insects, there are so many common ones that it is not at all difficult to get acquainted with them, and yet the average child probably again could not name a dozen. A boy perhaps might not fail to recognize a black or red spider, a bumble-bee, a lady bug, a dragon-fly, a glowworm, a fish-moth, a beetle, a bottle-fly, a cricket, a locust, a tomato-worm, a potato-bug or a rose-bug, but a girl probably could not identify each one. In learning the common habits of insects it is much more interesting usually if one reads a few of the best books about them. Two that are fascinating reading, whether one feels interested in this branch of nature study or not, are "The Life of the Bee," by Maeterlinck, and "The Life of the Spider," by Fabre, two books that are educating for any child.

Interest in rocks or stars are two other subjects that almost any child can study even in the most crowded part of the city, and probably the child's father is the one who will not only enjoy awakening a child's interest in these fields, but find a new recreation for evening hours himself.

And all parents will benefit their children's minds and bodies if they encourage their interest in the simple outdoor things. Summer is a good time to begin, and when winter comes the children will be apt to want to read something broader than fiction alone.

tection of Girls on Trains

EAD in the August 9 issue of the Chris- an Herald the startling announcement at 1,500 girls are lost in a year from gh trains between New York and Chi-

It is evident that the white slavers, ducing girls to get off trains before reach- heir destinations, are foiling the recent ation upon the part of Congress and the legislatures regarding white slavery, and endering fruitless the efforts of various ties to protect the girls after reaching destinations.

remedy proposed is the placing of high- e capable women as matrons upon all gh trains to look after women generally, railways to pay their salaries, furnish portation and meals. The article in your r of August 9 quotes a conductor as say- "How many times I have seen young get off the train with some new acquain- e before reaching their destination, and ve been powerless to prevent it! My has moved on and I have felt it would been better for that girl to have been hed under the wheels than to have gone the dreadful unknown with that stranger."

ow if the conductor is powerless to pre- such happenings, why not give him er and authority to prevent them? This ld be the quickest and most effective ns of curing this evil and protecting girls g upon trains. There should be amend- s to the white slavery laws making con- ors and perhaps other trainmen intra- e police, with power to arrest men or en trying to influence girls riding upon s. Suspicious persons should be placed er arrest immediately when found trying nfluence girls by questionable offers and ements, or in tempting them to leave s before reaching their destinations. girls should be prevented from leaving s before reaching their destinations, and ever there are suspicious cases on any conductors should have authority to charge of the girls until they reach their ination and then turn them over to the of some society that will give them the r warning and protection.

th the heavy burden the railroads now pon the people, being operated at a deficit billion dollars a year, it is probable that ation along the above lines could be more secured than the establishment of ons upon the trains, who would only act n advisory character and would have no power to prevent the crimes committed.

Are your Kitchen Chairs Spotless?

KITCHEN Chairs as well as other Kitchen things are likely to become greasy. So a gentle grease-dissolvent is needed. A housewife tells us that for this special purpose, she uses a tablespoonful of Gold Dust to half a pail of warm water. She applies this soapy Gold Dust water with a soft brush. She rinses the chairs with clear warm water, then cold to harden the surface. Turns them upside down in the air to dry. Probably it will occur to you that you can really cleanse and freshen your market and clothes baskets by the same simple treatment.

Methodists Confer on City Wo

FOR three weeks in August, as a measure to promote the Centenary aims, the Methodist Church held at Drew Seminary, Madison, New Jersey, a profitable conference of city pastors, in which all problems presented by the modern city were met and faced by the consolidated experiences of the whole company. There were seventy-five pastors, and they, with Methodist and other experts on special problems, forged out a working plan. The conference was called because the Church realized that the day had come when it must have a special program for the city and the country adaptable to many situations. The modern city has overrun the Church, and now the problem is to make the Church a vital factor in the modern city.

The program of the conference consisted of addresses in the mornings, followed by questions and answers in which the students often became the teacher and the lecturer the student. In the afternoons the men divided for study of types of churches. The work was divided under the heads of the downtown church, the English-speaking community toward which foreign-speaking communities are approaching, and the church which is in a polyglot foreign community. For the suburban church, the tendency was toward a community church organization, centering in its building all the various interests of normal American people. The downtown church is to be organized for the ministry to transients and to the people of the boardinghouses. The polyglot church will place its emphasis on educational classes, on directed amusements and Americanization work, giving special attention to the needs of recent immigrants. The church which is gradually being surrounded by foreign elements will mix the two types of work. The plan is to adjust every Methodist Episcopal church to the needs of its field and to make the church serve the community instead of living off the community. Surveys will be conducted to develop each church's opportunity.

A TYPICAL church is that in East Chicago, under Dr. George B. Jones, where $250,000 is to be spent in the building of a community house in connection with the church, which will be made the religious center for the whole family. Not far from the church is a solid block of 7,000 Poles, while thirty-six races are mingled in the community. Some of these people are thoroughly loyal to their national church and inclined to be a little suspicious of any Protestant approach; some of them are entirely alienated from all churches and antagonistic to anything that bears a resemblance to "capitalistic patronage." The aim of the new community house will therefore be to throw itself open to all these various groups, to give them free use of the building with abundant opportunity to hold any meetings they desire, and, without seeming to press its work upon them, to endeavor to relate them to the church, through the play life of the children, the recreation of the young people, religious education and worship. It will take the people as they are and attempt to build them up into a thorough appreciation of American purposes and ideals, both political and religious. Eight or ten people will be needed to run the plant. Dr. Jones said that in the past the church had reached only English-speaking people and found it difficult to reach the alien races with the evangelistic message alone, although it had reached them in some degree through their children, through the vacation Bible school and Sunday school.

THE Roseville church, Newark, is a church in an English-speaking community which is becoming a business center. The church is doing a large work with Boy Scouts, Campfire Girls, young people's clubs, a men's club, and social organizations. The Church House is open seven days a week; there are eight paid assistants. The Roseville church conducts a loan fund, coal fund and employment agency. Loans are limited to ten dollars to members and lo constituents of the church, and paid back in small instalments. U the coal fund the pastor has the delivered and receives payment in instalments. The church has a vis nurse and conducts a complete pro of social service. The Roseville ch is used as an example in the cour study. The plan for the polyglot ch is just a multiplication of all these of work for each racial group.

ANOTHER church which was as an example is the First Me dist Church, Boston, an old f church which found itself with a g of loyal members but entirely ou contact with its community. church is in a lodging-house dist 80 per cent. of the male lodgers b bachelors, skilled mechanics and f permanent. To relate the church t community it was necessary to both church and community a attitude of mind toward each other a great annual homecoming dinne new program was outlined. The p used newspaper publicity, the ch bulletin board, blotters and va other methods to get the program b the community. On rulers he printed "A good rule; go to the Methodist Church." A staff of wo was built up and the church started not to save the church but to the neighborhood through the ch Through a landladies' guild meetin three P. M. the interest of the lod house keepers was obtained, through them the young people reached. A Little Mothers' Club bro the children. A laundry was prov in the community house where gi the lodging-houses could do the washings that they had previously in their rooms. The problem of lo ness was met by a Sunday after social service beginning with a dir followed by a hike, then a luncheon, then Epworth League. The girls for their dinner, but the luncheon free. The young women were orga into social units for work in the munity and for soldiers and sai and through this social approach young men and some young wo were led to consecrate themselve Christian work.

Provision was made for young w to meet their friends. The ch organizes block parties and comm sings and reaches out in every wa serve every element of people thro out its parish. The pastor says it is to build up a successful settlement and not sidestep the religious eleme

NEW BEDFORD, Mass., has pla 4,000 shade trees in the last s years, according to a bulletin is recently by the Massachusetts Fore Association, which says:

"It is a conservative estimate twenty-five years from now those sh trees will be worth to New Bedford $1,000,000. The actual replacem value of those trees at that time tainly will be well over that amount

"Does it pay to plant shade tr If it doesn't the people of New Bed are wasting their money, but they h had enough experience to know th is a good investment. We have h the complaint that it is useless to p shade trees in thickly settled distri New Bedford has disproved this the We have seen shade trees thriving narrow back streets in the heart of mill districts with scores of child playing about them.

"The conditions in New Bedford typical of scores of towns and ci and what has been done there can duplicated by practically every city town in the State."

As a Little Chapel Was Built

A HURCH was built in Korea a hort time ago, and the mission- ell us it was not the stained-glass, e-pillared kind, but a mud-walled, ied-roofed church. It was white- d and furnished with brick ovens hich the people could sit—this ıg system being the same kind as ancestors had used for thousands rs. Gifts for the church came from rated givers. Among them was l woman known as Mother Moon, went to the hills to gather fuel. on kept her in firewood, but she red the extra wood to sell in the t-place, smiling, it was said of s she carried her loads on her head, . were to be exchanged for money that could be given to the little church. Another giver was Pang. Every one in the village, it was said, knew that Pang got only five dollars a month in wages, yet Pang gave twenty-five dollars toward the chapel fund.

A merchant sitting behind his counter, watching everything that went on about the village, said as he observed the little church in building: "'Tis strange—those Christians have gone hungry; they've worked hard, and yet they are the happiest people in our village. They gave $85 for the church, and if everything they possessed were pooled it would be worth about $150. That is how the little chapel across the way was built."—Missionary News.

Transforming Power

a Chinese city of fifty thousand ere lives a Chinese Methodist iant, chairman of the board of rds in his church, who helps more e, his pastor says, than any person at town. There was a time when as sunk low from being an opium n, when he squatted at the street- and cried to passersby for just a "cash," this being his means of hood. He came under the influence e mission, and quickly prosperity ved him. Some time ago, in a ous meeting, a frenzied opium- cried out in hopeless agony: "Can Jesus save a man so far gone as Kung Papa heard the cry. Leaving ask he ran quickly to that one and "Save you? Of course he can save you. Look at me; I was worse off than you; I had more sores on me than you have from the hypodermic injections; I was more ragged than you; I had been a victim longer than you." He then grabbed the sorrowful man in his arms and turned him to the audience saying: "Here is the proof that Christ is able to save one so badly off as the man here. See his rags; look on my silk. Jesus Christ is able to transform his rags into silk also. Look on my face; it was worse than this man's, and his can be changed also. I had no money; now I have a good business. Once I was continually hungry all the time; now I have plenty. Jesus did it for me: he can do it for this poor man."—J. D. Gillilan, in Missionary News.

The Trade of the World

IE United States is second among the countries of the world in for- rea and produces more than half he world's sawed lumber, but is about last in measures for reforest- and conserving the lumber supply ture generations.

IE United States is the greatest producer of resin and turpentine ie world. France comes next with one-fourth our production. But ss we replant cut-over pine lands he South the whole turpentine in- ry may some day, perhaps in n years, be only a memory. There 124,000,000 acres available for pine er, which, if fully stocked, would ly all domestic needs for Southern w pine and allow 12,000,000,000 d feet for export each year.

BESIDES exports of over 3,500,000,000 board feet of lumber, American wood-using industries export annually products to a value of $130,000,000, including $32,000,000 worth of agricultural implements, $30,000,000 worth of automobiles, $1,500,000 worth of sewing machines, $10,000,000 worth of tools, axes, hammers and shovels, $6,500,000 worth of furniture, $1,100,000 worth of sash, doors and blinds, and $2,500,000 worth of pianos, as well as other items.

DURING the next few years Europe will need 7,000,000,000 feet a year of lumber in excess of the normal consumption to repair the devastation caused by the war. This may be reduced somewhat by an increased use of brick, stone and steel.
